THE APPROACHING SESSION.

FOUR great questions of domestic interest are at this time before the public, each of which is sufficient to give Parliament ample work, and the satisfactory solution of any one of which would not only rescue the approaching Session from the charge of barrenness, but entitle it to honourable distinction in the annals of England. The first, and we may say the loudest, of these questions—considering the outcry that is made about it—is that of Transportation, involving the whole treatment of our criminal population, both before and after conviction. The second is the question of Popular Education, far more important, but not so likely to excite attention as the first, because it appeals more to the justice than to the fears of society, and more to the future than to the present. The third is the great fiscal question of the Income and Property Tax, which may be made to involve, if our Ministers are wise and bold, the subject of our national finances as a whole, and the general revision of the existing Revenue system in all its ramifications. The last, and, as many whose opinions are entitled to the highest respect will think, not the least, is the old but ever-recurring subject of Parliamentary Reform, upon which Lord John Russell is known, and the Premier is suspected, to be engaged. Here of itself is work enough for a busy Session, even without the large questions of Foreign, Indian, and Colonial Policy which are certain to demand the anxious consideration of the Government and the Legislature.

We shall have ample opportunities in the columns of this Journal to discuss these questions as they arise. In the mean time a few words on the subject of our criminal population, and on the means in the power of the nation for the prevention as well as for the punishment of crime, will not be inappropriate. The fears of society have made this the question of the day; and, as fear is not always the safest of lawgivers, it becomes necessary to take reason into our councils, if we would avoid both injustice and cruelty.

If the subject of National Education cannot be made to precede that of the punishment of crime in the consideration of Parliament, we trust that means may be found by some of the earnest men who understand both questions in all their bearings to discuss them simultaneously. The one so intimately affects the other, that all the measures which Fear and Vengeance may adopt to punish the full-grown criminal, will fail of their purpose, if nothing more effectual be done to train in the right way the neglected infants of the poor in our large towns and cities, than has been done hitherto by all voluntary and other agencies which have been at work amongst them. It is of no use to gather the flower of the poppy that grows among the corn, if we leave the root untouched. Always, like Sisyphus, to be rolling a stone up a hill, and always to see it bounding down again; or, like the Danaides, to be always drawing water from the well in sieves, is but sorry employment. But these fabulous labours are scarcely more hopeless than the task of dealing with our criminals by the modes we have hitherto adopted. We fill our prisons only to empty them; and we empty them only to fill them again with offenders even more hardened or more hypocritical. We box and unbox the plague; we neglect the young children; we suffer them to crawl and prowl about the streets; to learn how to beg, to swear, to lie, and to pilfer; and, when they grow old enough to feel the passions of men and women, we hold up our hands in astonishment, and are scandalised that they have been such apt pupils in the school of Evil as to have become veterans in iniquity whilst still in their teens. Yet it is not surprising, except to those who deny the influence and the efficacy of education, that in their manhood and womanhood they should be as intractable and incorrigible as the children of the desert—that their hands should be against every man, and every man's hands against theirs—and that they should make systematic war against society, and the institutions on which it is founded.

We know it will be objected by many able and well-meaning people that education does not prevent crime. We admit it to the fullest extent that the argument can be employed. The forger and the swindler, the fraudulent bank-projector, the concocter of bubble companies, the embezzler of other people's moneys, and the man of intense selfishness and of ungovernable passions, are not uneducated. On the contrary, they may have been highly educated. But crimes of this kind, which never will be entirely eradicated—except in Utopia, or during the Millennium—do not amount to one-tenth of the offences upon which Law and Justice have every day to adjudicate. Nine-tenths of the criminals who plague and puzzle Society are rendered criminal by the combined operation of extreme poverty and extreme ignorance; and poverty and ignorance are so intimately associated that they continually act and react upon each other. If we take any thousand of the young and middle-aged criminals who fill our gaols for a season, and are periodically let loose, either with or without tickets of leave, to prey upon the public as pickpockets, housebreakers, garotters, or footpads, we shall find—whatever may be the amount of education received by the criminals who have moved in a higher sphere of society, and who have become forgers, embezzlers, and defaulters—that not one in ten has received more than the mere rudiments of learning, and that one-half or two-thirds are but little removed from the condition of savages. If there be a difference, it is, perhaps, that they have all the vices of civilisation superadded to the peculiar vices of a lower state of society. Among this class of criminals, when full grown, there is but rarely any reformation. But if taken young—if cared for in the tender years of their infancy—if instructed at the charge of the State—if made to know and to feel, as they advance into adolescence, that it is as much the right of every child born on the soil of Great Britain to receive instruction as it is the right of a man to his own property, of a Peer to sit in Parliament, or of the Queen to wear her crown, the next generation would not present us with more than one or two hundred criminals for every thousand which now afflict us. It is not so much the abstract question of secondary punishment that puzzles our Juries, our Judges, and our Lawgivers, as the increasing number of our criminals. It is this growing nuisance which renders the subject so difficult. If we succeed in diminishing crime one-half by means of a well-devised and complete scheme of National Education, statesmanship and philanthropy will be able to deal more easily and more successfully with the remainder. In that event, if our colonies will not receive our criminals, we shall not be so much distressed at the necessity of keeping them at home. Having tried Prevention, and found it, to some extent, successful, we shall debate with quieter consciences and cleaner hands the great question of Punishment.

The existing generation of criminals, who cannot find employment, even if disposed to reform, either from the loss of character or from the difficulty or impossibility of conforming to the habits of an industrious and sober life, must, of course, be dealt with. They cannot be hanged. It is possible that they must not be transported. It is very doubtful whether they can be reformed. But is it impossible that they should be punished and yet usefully employed? Are there no great public and unremunerative works which a great nation might undertake, so as to get hard work, if nothing else, out of the men whom it is compelled to feed and to look after? We think that there are; and that the large sums expended in prisons and reformatories might find their way to the reclamation of counties from the sea—to the construction of harbours of refuge—to the embankment of the coast—and even to the embellishment of the great towns and cities of which these successive crops of criminals have been for years the burden as well as the reproach.

THE WAR WITH PERSIA.

BASSADORE, ON THE ISLAND OF KISHIM, IN THE PERSIAN GULF.

THE view of Bassadore engraved upon the preceding page is taken from a sketch by an officer of the East India Company's brig-of-war Euphrates—one of the expeditionary squadron. The small town of Bassadore, which does not contain above 200 houses, was presented some years since to the Indian Government by the Imaum of Muscat, for the purpose of forming a dépôt for their vessels of war cruising in the Persian Gulf. It is situated on one of the extreme points of the Island of Kishim, and has been selected as the rendezvous for the fleet in the operations against the Shah. The inhabitants support themselves by fishing and furnishing supplies to the vessels of the Indian navy. Formerly the Commodore and the senior officers of the Gulf fleet resided here, in the house on the point to the right of the sketch; but they are now more comfortably stationed at Bushire, and the house at Bassadore has gone to ruin. Every visitor to Bassadore for the last thirty years will remember the generous hospitality of Khudada, the provision-contractor to the fleet. On the house is shown on the extreme left. There the old Persian sits and smokes his kollune, shaking his head, and repressing a smile at the report of the immense wealth which he has industriously accumulated. The Indian Government have, at Bassadore, hospitals, a storehouse for their naval armament, and a coal dépôt. The port has good anchorage for the largest vessels, and is perfectly sheltered from the north-west winds, which blow with great violence during the winter months. The three straight-topped hills in the middle distance are called the Hummahs, and are the marks for the anchorage. To the extreme right is a guide for vessels making the port to avoid the sunken rocks and shoals. The sketch shows the brig-of-war Euphrates shifting her anchorage, and by the side is one of the buggalows which trade between Bombay and the Persian Gulf.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

THE PARIS CONFERENCE.—THE FRONTIER SETTLED AT LAST.

It appears from a notice in the Moniteur of Wednesday last that the Conference has signed a protocol putting an end to the difficulties caused by the conduct of Russia with reference to the Isle of Serpents and the frontier. According to that official organ the Conference has, by unanimous agreement, decided that the frontier shall follow the valley of Trajan up the River Yalpuch, leaving Tighoral and Tobek to Moldavia; Russia retaining Komrat upon the right bank, with 330 versts of territory.

The Isle of Serpents is to be considered as part of the mouths of the Danube.

The Conference recognise that it was the intention of the Congress, by Article 21, to re-establish the territories west of the new boundaries in their former situation; and, in order to conform to the intentions of the negotiators of peace, it has decided that these territories shall be annexed to Moldavia, with the exception of Dolk on the Danube, which will revert to Turkey. The Conference has decided, moreover, that the boundaries shall be settled and take effect by the 30th March at the latest, and that at the same date the Austrian and the troops and the British fleet shall have evacuated the Danubian Principalities and the interior waters of Turkey. The Commission of the Principalities will then be able to enter those provinces, and proceed to the execution of its mission. At the conclusion of its labours the Commission will report to the Conference, which will reassemble according to the terms of Article 25, in order to settle by a convention the final agreement between the contracting parties as to the organisation of the Principalities.

The following explanation of the steps which have led to the amicable arrangement is given by the Vienna correspondent of the Times:—

During many weeks there was reason to fear that Russia would be supported by the French Government in her attempt to avoid fulfilling the engagements which she entered into on the 30th of March, but the reclamations of the British and Austrian Governments roused the Emperor Napoleon from a temporary lethargy, and he himself took the matter in hand. On examining the map used at the Conference Louis Napoleon at once saw that his Minister for Foreign Affairs had exhibited an undue bias in favour of Russia, and Count Walewski was in imminent danger of being dismissed. From the moment that the Emperor gave his attention to the frontier question all collusion became impossible, and it was therefore soon settled that New Bolgrad should not under any circumstances be permitted to remain in the hands of Russia. Unfortunately, however, Messrs. de Walewski and de Morny had contracted certain moral engagements with Russia, and England and Austria were urged to consent that a part of the boundary line should be formed by a tributary of the Yalpuch instead of the main river of that name. It was at first proposed by France that the territory between the two rivers should be left in the hands of Russia as a compensation for New Bolgrad, but England and Austria positively declared that they would never consent to such an arrangement. After long and wearisome discussions, the French Government proposed that Russia should cede Old Bolgrad (Tabaeki), as well as New Bolgrad, to Moldavia, and the Isle of Serpents and the Delta of the Danube to the Porte. As Moldavia had no claim to Old Bolgrad, and the Paris Conference had entirely lost sight of the Isle of Serpents, it was but just that some compensation should be made to Russia for the cession of those places; and it was therefore agreed that her indemnification should be that piece of land lying between the Yalpuch and its above-mentioned tributary. At first Russia was unwilling to consent to the arrangement, but the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, being strongly urged by Lord Cowley and Baron Hübner, gave Count Kisseleff to understand that there was no chance whatever that Russia would obtain more favourable conditions. That Count Kisseleff accepted the propositions of the Allies on Saturday, the 27th ult., you learnt by my telegraphic despatch of the following day. The date on which M. de Kisseleff was informed by his Government that it approved of what had been done at Paris is not known here.

PRUSSIA AND SWITZERLAND.

The Neufchâtel question still remains in the same state, but there is an impression abroad that an arrangement is to take place. There is said to be a slight shade of difference between the English and French Governments on the manner in which the liberation of the prisoners is to take place. The King of Prussia, it is said, is perfectly willing to renounce his rights to Neufchâtel; but he is unwilling to have the appearance of purchasing the release of the prisoners by the renunciation. This is now the chief difficulty. The Swiss Confederation, on their side, think that their amour propre also ought to be taken into account. It is, however, on this point that the difference exists between the two Governments. It is not possible that for a mere matter of amour propre the contending parties will hold out much longer. In official quarters the question is considered as all but settled. On the strength of information from Paris, the order for corps of observation on the Baden and Wurtemberg frontiers has been suspended, which shows that there is no apprehension of the passage of Prussian troops through these States.

The only reference made to the Swiss affair by the Prince of Prussia in the various speeches he made on the occasion of his jubilee last week, occurred in his answer to the deputation of the House of Deputies. To them he said:—

We stand on the eve of great and grave events. It is to be expected that his Majesty the King will shortly have occasion to summon a portion of the army to arms, and every one I know for certain will obey the summons of his King with readiness and joy.

At taking leave of the garrison of Coblentz, previously to coming to Berlin, the Prince drew the attention of the officers assembled on parade to the grave position in which Prussia is: he congratulated those troops who were destined to be put in motion on their important mission, and promised them in advance the sympathies of all who remained behind to follow them in the paths they would tread while struggling for the King's honour and rights. As he saw before him various detachments from troops that had fought with bravery and devotion under his own eyes, he would expect them to exhibit again the same soldierly virtues, and so again inseparably attach victory to the Prussian colours.

In Switzerland the preparations for war are going forward with unabated zeal. General Dufour has organised a numerous staff. On his application, the Federal Council has given orders to place on a war footing eighteen additional battalions of infantry, as well as nine companies of carbineers, cavalry, and artillery.

AMERICA.

By the Royal mail steam-ship Africa, which arrived at Liverpool on Sunday, we have intelligence from New York to the 24th ult. The political news is not of much importance.

On Tuesday, 23rd, the Senate debated, without coming to any conclusion, the bill for the settlement of the claims of the officers of the revolution. The House passed the Indian, Pension, and West Point Academy bills.

A despatch from Washington, to the New York Herald, states that orders have been sent to the Government officers to stop all shipments of men, arms, and provisions to General Walker.

The Nicaragua Transit Company, an American steam-line, whose business Walker broke up for non-payment of moneys alleged to be due to Nicaragua, has applied to the President to issue writs for the arrest of Walker (provided he can be found within the limits of the United States), as also Charles Morgan, formerly agent of the company, and C. K. Garrison, also a former agent; each of whom is charged with joining Walker in the breaking up of the line. The total damages sustained by the company are put down at 2,000,000 dollars, but it is extremely doubtful if they ever recover a farthing of it.

The last advices represent Walker as in almost a hopeless condition —cut off from his ragged and half-starved army, and with the chances of escape from the allies of Central America ten to one against him. It may be, however, that his very desperation will nerve him to hold on, in hopes of speedy aid; and if so, it is not unlikely that the tragedy may be postponed for a few months longer. The agent of Walker, who was in Washington endeavouring to raise a loan of half a million dollars, disappeared suddenly on hearing of the reverses of his master.

The negro insurrection excitement still continues. A despatch from Louisville of the 20th of December says:—"The Russellville Herald of Wednesday last says that the negro insurrection excitement exists in the neighbourhood of Volney and Gordonsville. A number of negroes had been arrested; a negro at one of the ironworks in Tennessee said he knew all about the plot, but would die before he would tell. He thereupon received 500 lashes, from which he died. At Cadiz, Trig county, Kentucky, a free negro was hung after being tried by a Vigilance Committee. There are a number more in gaol, some of whom will be hung. Judge Cook has called a meeting of the Court for Christmas-day. Excitement runs very high." A distinguished senator in Congress, from Tennessee, has lost 10,000 dollars by the panic, nine of his slaves having been hung for supposed complicity in the imagined insurrection. If an insurrection should finally break out it will be caused more by the rigorous measures at late adopted by the slaveowners than from any preconcerted action on the part of the slaves.

There has been very severe weather of late, and the snow was lying on the ground to the depth of several inches. During a recent storm the fine packet-ship New York, and the barque Tasso, were lost on the Jersey coast. Seven persons perished by the wreck of the latter, and, it is said that numbers of the 300 saved from the packet-ship will die from the sufferings they experienced from cold and hunger. On the same evening that these sad tidings were received the splendid steam-ship Knoxville, of the New York and Savannah line, took fire at her wharf, and was burnt to the water's edge.

AUSTRALIA—ARRIVAL OF THE "MONTMORENCY."

On Monday last the Royal mail-ship Montmorency arrived off the south end of Port Phillip, with dates from Melbourne to the 16th of October, Sydney to the 13th, and Adelaide to the 8th. She brought a valuable cargo of merchandise, a fair complement of passengers, and 100,000 oz of gold, valued at £400,000.

The receipts of gold by escort for the week previous to the sailing of the Montmorency were very large; but there was no change in the value of the precious metal at Melbourne.

Relative to the proposed separation of Moreton Bay, the following announcement appeared in the columns of the Sydney Morning Herald:—"We understand that private despatches have been received by the Governor-General announcing the intention of her Majesty's Government to detach the Moreton Bay district from the colony of New South Wales, and erect it forthwith into a separate colony What boundary line is proposed to separate the two colonies, or whether it has been fixed, we are unable to say."

The Rocky River gold-fields are beginning to yield a proportionate amount of gold to the people located there. The first northern escort arrived at Maitland on the 21st of September, bringing down 3300 ounces of gold from the Rocky River.

The report of the Commissioners of National Education for the year 1855 has just been published. There are fifty-one schools established upon this system in New South Wales.

A fine sample of black-lead ore has been discovered on the south side of Mount Keira, about six miles from Wollongon, by Mr. Jekyl. It is expected that this will become an article of considerable export, as it may be procured in large quantities.

It is reported that coal has been discovered near Yankalilla, and that specimens are on their way to Adelaide.

THE OPIUM TRADE IN CHINA.

The long-pending negotiation, between the Chinese authorities and opium-dealers, respecting a duty on the drug, has resulted in an agreement that it shall be settled at three taels per chest (Shanghae) at 20 dollars per chest—equal at the present price of dollars to 23 taels of sycee.—North China Herald, Oct. 25.

MURDER OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF PARIS.

Great excitement was created in Paris last Saturday evening by the rumour that the Archbishop of Paris had been assassinated by a priest, while officiating in the church of St. Etienne-du-Mont. It appears that the Archbishop had gone to the church, according to announcement, to preside over the opening of the annual neuvaine in honour of the saint who is patroness of the city of Paris. After vespers, and after a sermon preached by Mgr. Lacarrière, Bishop of La Basse-Terre, a procession was formed and paraded round the church in the customary way, the Archbishop in his robes walking at the head of the lady patronesses of Ste. Geneviève. Just as the Archbishop arrived opposite the outer door and was about to turn up the nave, a man advanced towards him from the crowd of spectators, and, removing the prelate's cope with his left hand, plunged with great force with his right hand a large clasp-knife into the prelate's breast, near the heart, exclaiming as he did so, "Down with the goddess!" (he has la déesse.) The Archbishop fell back two steps, cried out "Ah, le malheureux!" staggered, and fell into the arms of the priests who surrounded him. The wounded prelate mounted two or three times, as if in great suffering, and was the moment after bathed in the blood which flowed from the wound. He was immediately conveyed into the vestry and medical assistance sent for; but all the assassin, a young man of about thirty years old, dressed in dark-coloured clothes, made no attempt to escape, and was immediately seized; he had at the moment the knife, from which blood was dropping, still in his hand.

He was conveyed to the mairie of the 12th arrondissement, and M. Moignon, substitute of the Procureur Impérial, and M. Treilhard, examining magistrate, were immediately summoned, and commenced an interrogatory of the assassin. M. Cordouin, Procureur Impérial, and M. Pietri, Préfet of Police, subsequently arrived on the scene. From what he said it appears that he is a priest of the diocese of Meaux, Pergeo by name, and had been four or five times interdicted for misconduct, and some months back was again suspended for having preached against the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. In November last he displayed great zeal in defending a woman who was tried at Melun for poisoning her husband, and though she was convicted of the crime, and condemned to hard labour for life, he printed a pamphlet declaring that she was innocent, and casting the grossest imputations on the judges and the public prosecutor. The pamphlet was seized by the authorities before it could be distributed, and it caused a new complaint against him to be made to his bishop. A little later he uttered menaces against a respected clergyman of the diocese of Paris who had done him many kindnesses; and the clergyman deemed it necessary to make representation to the police. On the 24th December the man came to Paris, and took up his residence at an hotel No. 3, Rue Racine. He was accustomed to pass days in the public libraries; and even on Saturday he went to one as usual. He endeavoured to obtain an appointment in the diocese of Paris, but it was manifest to him that the Archbishop would not grant him one. On hearing that he appears to have projected the death of the prelate, and he purchased for the purpose a knife at the shop of a cutler in the Rue Dauphine. After the service the previous fasts he was asked if he had stabbed the Archbishop more than once? and he answered, "No; I only gave him one stab, for I struck in the heart, and knew the blow was mortal. "Why," he was asked, "did you cry 'Down with the goddess!' when you struck the fatal blow?" "Because I do not believe in the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, against which I have preached from the pulpit: and I wish to protest once more against the impious doctrine." "Why did you commit so grave a crime?" "Because I was interdicted, and because the Archbishop had declared that the interdiction would not be removed." He then added, after a pause, "A priest cannot be allowed to die of hunger." He admitted that he had gone to the church with the premeditated intention of killing the Archbishop. After the wound had been dressed, cries arose, with some violence, "No goddess! no goddess!" The assassin replied to the questions put to him with calmness, and only displayed agitation when he referred to the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. His features are full of expression. In the evening he was conveyed to the conciergerie, and a turnkey was placed with him in his cell

THE SAWARD FORGERY GANG.

If 1856 is to be remembered as the year of gigantic frauds, 1857 threatens to be no less celebrated in the annals of crime. Hardly has the new year begun than we are called upon to chronicle the exploits of a gang of forgers, who, if all we hear be true, seem to have displayed an amount of skill and daring which has seldom been equalled in the criminal history. James Townshend Saward, Esq., Barrister-at-law and Special Pleader, of the Inner Temple and the Home Circuit"—as he figures in the Law List of the present year—is the principal culprit; and a certain James Anderson appears to have acted as junior partner. From the evidence given by Henry Atwell, a convict under sentence of transportation for life, we learn the mode in which the firm carried on business on their own account. About twelve months ago Atwell, who had formerly dabbled in bank cheques, and some paid cheques, which had been given to Anderson by the same gentleman. Saward, Anderson, and Atwell then went to a private house in Leman-street, where Anderson had taken a room as a place from which the cheque could be sent. Anderson went in while Saward and Atwell waited outside. Soon after a man went into the house in Leman-street, and in a few minutes came out and went to Anderson's, where Atwell followed him and saw the money paid for the cheque dated January 8. The man, who was closely watched by Atwell, then went back to Leman-street, and gave the money to Anderson. The various members of the gang then walked off to the Eastern Counties Railway, where Anderson had another young man in waiting, whom he sent with the second cheque, for £95 17s. 6d. Here Atwell was again employed as watcher. He followed the young man to the bank, saw the money paid, and kept his eye upon the messenger, it being his duty to see that all was right. On this occasion the young man who got the money was going over London-bridge, instead of going back to the railway. Atwell touched him on the shoulder and asked him whether he was not going the wrong way (Langham Place). He was evidently going to his last employer's to ask if Anderson had sent for his character. Atwell said to him, "There is a gentleman waiting for you at the railway. He has sent me for you, as he has a very particular way of trying his servants before he employs them." They then went back together to the railway. The whole of the gang, five in number, then went into a public-house and divided the money. This appears to have been the regular mode in which the firm transacted business. After having completed the forgery of one or more cheques, they hired furnished apartments for a week, then went out into the City (Langham Place), and employed a young youth to act as bearer of the cheques to the banks, giving him directions to bring back the proceeds to the newly-hired rooms, which were of course immediately evacuated when the object of their hirers had been thus accomplished. The gentleman principally engaged in the hiring department appears to have been Mr. Anderson, who rejoiced in an infinite assortment of wigs and whiskers, as well as in the weekly practice of "immasking his noted outer garments" in some new disguise. It was in the department of some other gentleman of the firm to act as follower to the bearer of the cheque, and to see that he never was to enter the bank "promiscuously" at the same time as the extemporised messenger, and to check operations at the counter; in case of failure to decamp instantly, in order to warn the associates who were in waiting; or, in case of success, to follow the messenger. In the above instances Atwell acted as watcher. One of the master devices of Mr. Saward appears to have been his device for extorting a signature from a forward practitioner of the law. A gentleman connected with the firm had "accidentally found in" the pockets of Mr. Turner, a solicitor, a quantity of blank draughts on Gosling and Co. The point was then to get Turner to sign a draught in order that these blanks might be turned by the forger's craft into gold. The contrivance adopted was this:—The name of Hesp was assumed for the nonce by one of the confederates, and attached to a bill for twenty odd pounds. Mr. Atwell took this I O U to Mr. Turner's offices, directly him to write a lawyer's letter for the amount. The requisite sum was meanwhile furnished to the alleged Hesp, the bill was given up to the alleged debtor, and in due course the £20, which had been lodged for the purpose, was paid into the lawyer's office. In a day or two Atwell called there to receive it, trusting that Mr. Turner would sign a cheque for the amount. So ingenious was the villany that Atwell had dealt with Mr. Turner under the name of Mr. W. Hunter, in order that Mr. Turner, by making the cheque payable to that name, might, in the manner in which he wrote "Hun," so as the better to enable the forgers to fill up the bank cheques for hundreds. All this ingenuity, however, was on this first occasion thrown away. Mr. Turner was quarrelsome, and refused to sign. Mr. Turner simply paid him over the hard cash; and the whole process had to be repeated again, with a second I O U for a larger sum, lodged in the same way, and handed over to the same gentleman. The second time the ruse succeeded, and the blank draughts on "Goslings" were filled up to a very large amount.

The charges against Saward and Anderson were heard at the Mansion-house on Saturday, and again on Wednesday last. On both occasions the court was crowded to excess. The examination has been again adjourned till next Wednesday.

LIFE IN THE FAR WEST.—A bloody tragedy was performed at the Baldwin House in this city (Monmouth, Illinois) this afternoon (Dec. 1). I was conversing with a gentleman in Dr. Thayer's drug-store about two o'clock, when the cry of murder was heard, and we all started out to discover the cause. We were soon directed by the throng of people to the above-named hotel, distant only a few yards; and there, entering the office, we beheld the victim of the sanguinary struggle, and conflict it has been my lot to witness. It is impossible to describe the horror depicted on the visages of that throng of spectators called there at the moment's notice by the circumstance. One of the brothers, says to Mr. Crosier, "I am now going to cowhide you;" and one of the boys holding a cocked pistol to his head, directed the other to inflict the threatened punishment, which he immediately commenced. He had struck three or four blows, when Crosier pulled a dirk-knife from a side-pocket, and, passing at the same time his left arm around the neck of the one who pulled the knife, stabbed him in the left breast, and, as quick as thought, withdrew the knife and struck the one who held the pistol a back-handed blow which reached, as did the first, to the heart of his victim. Both received their death-wounds in less than two seconds, and were both bloody corpses in three minutes after they were struck. The old man had gone out into the hall and locked the door, and stood with one hand on the outside with a pistol to keep out assistance. The affair has created an immense excitement here, I assure you. The young man Crosier is under arrest, having surrendered himself into custody, and is to undergo an examination to-morrow. The sympathies of the people are mostly with Crosier. He acts and looks the picture of despair. He is a young man, some twenty-seven to thirty years old, and unmarried. He is said to have been engaged to the lady in question, who is at present out of the State. The other parties were respectable farmers, and two of them, I understand, members of the Church in good standing.—Rochester American.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE assassination of the Archbishop of Paris, M. Sibour, has naturally excited a European sensation. The late Prelate, an Ultramontanist of the highest school, and in so far an enemy to the Church of France, was an amiable and kindhearted man, and much affection was felt for him, personally, by those who had the opportunity of knowing him well. He died in sacerdotal garb, and while taking part in one of the processions of the Church. The assassin is a priest named Verges, who is represented as a man of turbulence and insubordination, but in regard to whom closer and unbiassed observation might lead an investigation to a deduction somewhat different from that of the Roman Catholic journalists who have judged him. That his mind is disturbed there can be no doubt, but it may appear that a strong conviction that, in compliance with his duty as a priest bound by vows, he owed allegiance to the last invented and outrageous dogma of the Immaculate Conception (in which he disbelieved) was the first disturbing cause; after which he brought his warped intellect to consider that, as his Church punishes error by force, so force might lawfully be used to repress error in her ministers. The unhappy madman's cry, as he struck down the hierarch who had suspended him for not preaching the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, was "No goddesses!" He will, in all probability, be put to death: but the question what caused his insanity will remain for solution, and has a significance, inasmuch as the element to which we have adverted may be working in thousands of other Roman Catholic minds upon which the Papal fable has been thrust.

The Peace Conferences have brought the questions between the Great Powers to a close; that is to say Russia is much better off than she was at the signing of the Treaty of Paris, and receives a large tract of territory as a reward for now agreeing to do what she had already agreed to do, but shirked from doing. Her diplomatists have served her well and so have ours. For the rest, she is particularly urgent that England and Austria should withdraw, the one her fleet, the other her army; and that a day should be fixed for this being done; but both Powers—with the utmost civility, and while describing their desire to evacuate sea and land to be as great as Russia's that they should do so—have replied that "as soon as possible" are words of sufficient precision for fixing the withdrawal of forces which are a standing hint to Russia that the treaty, such as it is, must be observed for the present.

The Canton bombardment has been variously treated by our public writers. Practical people, wedded neither to party nor fanaticism, take the view which we ventured to express last week, and regard the blow as a painful necessity. And to this conviction most people will have to come round in six months. But the Manchester folks and the Ultra-Conservatives raise a clamour, on different grounds. The former talk maudlin platitudes about cruelty and massacre, and the wickedness of war, as if it were not for the protection of trade, their idol, that nearly all English war is made. The Conservatives see matter for an attack upon the Government, and are, accordingly, lost in horror at a deed ten times worse than Sinope; and we should really be shocked to transfer to our columns the parallel which he Evangelical Herald is profane enough to draw between the battering down the vacated houses of some insolent barbarians and the most awful sacrifice and imprecation recorded in the Christian Scripture. Who is to lead the attack when Parliament meets, and which of the Herald's "great and good men" is to show that Admiral Seymour resembles Pontius Pilate, and that the people of England are like the Jews of Jerusalem? Sir Robert Peel has proclaimed himself unlucky in discovering texts, and, besides, he is just now in the Ministry, or his peculiar eloquence would be more worthy of such a line of argument than that of any other ornament of the Legislature.

We send a Napier to Washington, as Ambassador to the Court of President Buchanan. Lord Napier is a practised diplomatist, and a man of spirit and ability, and the appointment is in every way respectful to the Americans. We do not conceive that he will be the less welcome to the Republicans because he chances to have a title. We observe that some of the admirers of General Walker (whose fortunes are again doubtful) have been denouncing France and England for their hostility to his designs, and have characterised the English as a nation of filibusters—brave ones, they admit—who ought to have some fellow-feeling for a hero in their own line.

Why should it have been deemed necessary to announce in an official manner that the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert inherits no property in Odessa, upon the death of Prince Woronzow, we know not, unless there be truth in the report to which we alluded last week in reference to contemplated changes in the War-office. It may be well that the Minister of War should be cleared in the eyes and minds of the public of any suspicion of interest in Russia—otherwise we do not know what business the public has with the private affairs of a most amiable and excellent gentleman, to whom, little as he needs it, all would, however, be glad to hear that any accession of good fortune had occurred.

The Swiss difficulty may be said to be already patched up, and the absurd claim of the King of Prussia will not be allowed to disturb the peace of Europe, which may now, we presume, be regarded as perfect. The King of Greece has made a speech, in which he has been obliged to make amusingly sulky references to the Powers that created his kingdom, and to their condescension, and his hope soon to get rid of their armies. He spoke of the suppression of brigandage; and about the time his Majesty was delivering his congratulations an eminent citizen was actually being carried away by brigands, and this from no remote and lonely spot, but from the neighbourhood of a military station. The King of Naples has had another fright—one of his vessels having blown up, "or been blown up," and all on board killed. This looks like a companion demonstration to the explosion of the magazine the other day.

The terrible gales of the last week have done appalling mischief all round the coast. The tale of casualties is very frightful. Among its more prominent features are the loss of the Ostend packet Violet, with all hands, and the destruction of a life-boat and the drowning of all its brave crew. If Christmas charity have not subsided, a national subscription for those whose sorrows can be aided by money would be a fitting proof that all the glowing sentiments habitually recorded at this season are not mere words.

ROYAL VISIT TO THE PHOTOGRAPHIC EXHIBITION.—On Friday last week H.R.H. Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, honoured the Photographic Exhibition in Pall-mall with a visit, previous to the public opening on Saturday. The Royal party were attended by Colonel Seymour, and were received at the gallery by the council of the Photographic Society. The walls and screens are this year hung with several hundreds of photographs displaying the improvements recently made in this interesting art, both as regards scenery and portraiture. Without going into particulars, it may be mentioned that conspicuous in the gallery are the tables of stereoscopic pictures shown by Messrs. Bland and Long, Mr Williams, and the Stereoscopic Company; also the portraits by Mr. Mayall, of Regent-street, as they include some interesting pictures of the Royal Family of Oude, the Bench of Bishops, and several well-known statesmen.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF PARIS.

MONSEIGNEUR MARIE DOMINIQUE AUGUSTUS SIBOUR, Archbishop of Paris, was born in 1792. He had taken holy orders early in life, and was a clergyman much respected and loved for his piety and benevolence. Though inclined to the Liberal side in politics, he meddled but little in public affairs. His activity in procuring charities, and in aiding the poor, first brought him into notice. He was, in 1840, consecrated Bishop of Digne, in the department of the Basses Alpes in Provence, and was translated to the Archiepiscopal see of Paris on the 19th of August, 1848. Mgr. Sibour evinced in the administration of the diocese of Paris all the foresight and all the energy of his mind. He applied himself to the development of religious studies in his diocese; animated the zeal of the ecclesiastical school of the Carmes; established public conferences; and, in order to secure to the sacred ministry persons the most worthy, he ordered that, during the first five years of the priesthood, examinations should be gone through by the young priests on all matters important for them to be acquainted with. Mgr. Sibour endeavoured also successfully to increase the number of churches in the populous quarters of Paris. His death by the hand of an assassin—the fanatic, and, it is to be hoped, lunatic Verges occurred in the church of St. Etienne du Mont, Paris, on the 3rd inst.

JOSEPH BROTHERTON, ESQ., M.P.

JOSEPH BROTHERTON, Esq., the excellent and universally respected M.P. for Salford for now nearly a quarter of a century, was the architect of his own position and fortune. He was a successful cotton and silk manufacturer, from which business, after making an independent fortune, he retired some years ago. Mr. Brotherton was first returned to Parliament for the borough of Salford, as its first member, in 1832. In the House he showed himself ever a consistent and firm friend of Liberal principles and "all progressive measures, and especially all of a benevolent or educational character, had his earnest and staunch support. He carried his love of reform even to amending the mode of carrying on business in Parliament. Every one knows how strenuous were his efforts to shorten the sittings of the Commons after midnight in his attendance upon his Parliamentary duties Mr. Brotherton was most estimable as farmer, as the Speaker in the chair and Mr. Brotherton absent; and it was not an unfrequent occurrence for the Speaker to call upon the hon. member to move the adjournment of the House, when the Secretary to the Treasury had omitted. Mr. Brotherton was Chairman of the Private Bill Committee. He took so much interest in the business arrangements of the House of Commons that it was his invariable custom at the close of each Session to move for a series of returns showing the progress of public and private business, the number and duration of sittings, and the number of divisions. Though representing a manufacturing constituency, he was a warm advocate, with Lord Ashley (now Lord Shaftesbury) and the late Mr. Fielden, of the Ten Hours Bill, and was accustomed to deduce arguments in its favour from his own career. Mr. Brotherton was, in his way of living, a strict vegetarian and abstainer from all spirituous liquors and was an active supporter of those principles. In private as in public life he was a most worthy and amiable man, and was much esteemed and beloved by all who knew him. Mr. Brotherton to the general regret of his friends and the public, died suddenly on the 9th inst., whilst travelling in an omnibus from his residence, Rosehill, at Pendleton, into Manchester. He leaves a family. Some of his connections, like himself, have attained high public positions. His brother-in-law Lieut.-General Sir Thomas William Brotherton, K.C.B., and his son, James Brotherton, Esq., a barrister of the Middle Temple, is Receiver-General of the Inland Revenue.

A portrait of Mr. Brotherton is engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, Vol. VIII., p. 309.

MR JOHN BRITTON

JOHN BRITTON, the distinguished writer on architectural and archæological subjects, whose life was an admirable illustration "of what," to use his own words, "may be effected by zeal and industry with moderate talents, and without academic learning," was born on the 7th July, 1771, at Kington St. Michael, near Chippenham, in Wiltshire, where his father was a baker, maltster, shopkeeper, and small farmer. He received some slight elementary instruction in the village school; but, his parents dying early, he went to London to an uncle who apprenticed him as cellarman to Mr Meadham, a wine merchant, of the Jerusalem Tavern, Clerkenwell-green. Here he was wont to devote as much time as he could to visiting old book-stalls, and making small purchases; but, according to his own account, all the reading he could do, during the five apprenticeship, was by candlelight, in the cellar, and at occasional intervals only, not of leisure, but abstracted from his regular duty. His apprenticeship over, he found himself without connexions or any definite pursuit. The vicissitudes, privations, and hardships which he experienced during the next seven years were severe. Living in obscure lodgings at eighteenpence per week, he still indulged in his passion for reading in bed during the winter evenings, being unable to afford a fire. He tried to obtain a subsistence in the humbler walks of literature; such work as in the compilation of street ballads and chapbooks. A small publication of his about this time, entitled "An Account of the Surprising Adventures of Pizarro," a hero then made popular by Kotzebue and Sheridan, brought Britton into contact with Mr. Wheble, and resulted in an acquaintance with Mr. Wheble, the publisher of the Sporting Magazine, who employed him to compile a work in contemplation, called the "Beauties of Wiltshire." Britton's first publication in conjunction with a young friend better educated than himself, named Pugin. The "Beauties of Wiltshire," produced under their joint labours, proved remarkably prosperous, and was followed by the "Beauties of Bedfordshire," and other counties. Then came Mr Britton's great work, the "Architectural Antiquities of England," which established his reputation and opened his future profession and independence. His subsequent publications were very numerous, and many of them were very highly esteemed. Among these were his "Cathedral Antiquities of England," his "Architectural Antiquities of Normandy," his "Illustrations of Fonthill Abbey," and his "Dictionary of the Architecture and Archæology of the Middle Ages." Mr Britton produced some works on general subjects; among them were a "Memoir of John Aubrey," and an "Essay on the Authorship of the Letters of Junius," which included a Biography of Colonel Barré. In 1847 Mr Britton retired from his active avocations, and confined himself to writing an autobiography, which was to be prepared and printed from funds provided as a testimonial to him by his friends, who had formed themselves into an association called the "Britton Club" for the purpose. Mr. Britton had expressed himself most anxious that he might live to the New Year's Day of 1857, to complete this Autobiography, and, singularly enough, he did live to it, just three days, nevertheless, the book remains unfinished. He died on the 1st instant, at his residence, 17, Burton street, Burton-crescent, much and deservedly lamented, after a long and honourable career, during which he did good and essential service in the promoting and extending the study of British architecture and topography, and in improving the public taste and feeling for national antiquities.

DR. URE.

ANDREW URE, M.D., F.R.S., was born in Glasgow on the 16th of May 1778. He studied at the University of Glasgow, and subsequently at that of Edinburgh. In the year 1806 he was appointed, on the recommendation of Dr. Birkbeck, Anderssian Professor of Chemistry, and lecturer on Philosophy. He was at this time engaged in the establishment of the Glasgow Observatory, where he resided for some time, and had a visit from the celebrated Sir W. Herschel. He was eloquent and successful very successful in his class experiments. In 1818 he brought forward his new Experimental Researches on some of the leading doctrines of Caloric, which essay was read before the Royal Society, and published in their Transactions for that year. In 1821 appeared the first edition of his well-known 'Dictionary of Chemistry," which procured him the friendship of Sir H. Davy, Dr. Wollaston, and Dr. E. D. Clarke. His other and subsequent works were his paper "On the Ultimate Analysis of Vegetable Substances," in the Philosophical Transactions; his "System of Geology," his "Philosophy of Manufactures;" his book "Philosophy of Manufactures of Great Britain," in two volumes; and his "Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines"—a production of immense labour and research, the last edition of which appeared in the year 1852. This Dictionary has been translated into the leading Continental languages. Dr. Ure was a sound chemical philosopher, and was no less remarkable for accuracy in chemical analysis. It has been asserted, indeed, by competent authority that none of his results have ever been upset. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society; one of the original Fellows of the Geological Society, and also belonged to the Astronomical Society, and to most scientific Continental societies. He resided in London since the year 1830. Dr. Ure died on the 2nd inst., at his house, 18, Upper Seymour-street, Portman-square.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

MR. HENRY CHAMBERLAIN, whose sudden death occurred on the 2nd inst., at Desford, near Leicester, in the 56th year of his age, was extensively known in the agricultural world, and had been for many years in high repute as a breeder and feeder of Hereford cattle and Leicester sheep. He was a very successful competitor at the Smithfield Club, having gained more prizes than almost any other man, and on two occasions he obtained a gold medal for his stock. He was also famed as a first-rate judge of cattle, in which capacity he often officiated at the Royal Agricultural Society's meetings, as well as at the shows at Birmingham, Yorkshire, and many other exhibitions. He only so recently as the last Smithfield Club meeting was instrumental in making improvements in the prize-sheet for next year. As a stanch supporter of agricultural improvements, and a worthy specimen of the yeomanry of England, Mr. Chamberlain will long be held in grateful remembrance.

SIGNOR CRIVELLI

SIGNOR DOMENICO F CRIVELLI came to England in the year 1817, with his father, who was engaged as the principal tenor at the King's Theatre. Since that time Signor Crivelli dedicated himself to the profession of teaching singing, in which capacity he acquired great repute, which he maintained up to his death. Since the foundation of the Royal Academy of Music, in 1[illegible], he has been the principal professor of singin g at that institution, and almost all our present [illegible] have been his pupils Signor Crivelli also wrote a method o[illegible] and "Bel Canto," which is considered the best work extant on [illegible]. Signor died on the 31st ult., at his residence, 71, Upper Norton-street, Portland-p ace; he leaves behind him a fair professional name; he was beloved and esteemed by all who knew him

WILLS AND CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.—The will of the Right Hon. Julia Anne Countess Dowager of Hotham was proved under £4000 Rear-Admiral Sir Henry Hart, K.C.H., £18,000. The Rev. W. H. Cooper, of Kemp Town, £25,000. John Venn, Esq., of Highbury Park, £[illegible]. Thomas Worthington, Esq., of Stanton Hall, Cheshire, £5,000 within the province of Canterbury, and has left some thousands to charitable institutions in Manchester. John Collett, Esq., formerly M.P., £30,000, leaving it to the discretion of his executors, to pay fines imposed upon [illegible] and bequeaths to charities.—John Kenyon, Esq., F.R.G.S., [illegible], of Devonshire-place, West Cowes, and Wimbledon, £130,000 within the province. The will, though short, contains numerous legacies to his [illegible] friends, and one of large amount. Those not exceeding £3000 are free of legacy duty. £7000 to the Dean [illegible]; [illegible]-street, Gower street; to Robert Hawthorn, Esq., one of his executors, £20,000, and to James Booth, Esq., the other executor, £5000. DECREASE IN LAW BUSINESS.—The Munster News complains of the great falling off in law business in the south. In Dublin the business is looking up—decidedly more doing, and at advanced rates. The same says:—"The decline of all law business at quarter sessions has become quite notorious; but the decrease at quarter sessions has seldom perhaps been more remarkably exemplified than in the fact that the process served for this session by one officer in this county was only, whereas a few years back the numbers served by him at a similar period were [illegible]. Before the famine he served 180, and had 200 civil cases since then. In consequence of the decrease of the reduced population, the increase of confidence, the increase of cash dealings, and perhaps the abatement of the spirit of litigation, the business has fallen off in the manner stated. Which a falling-off here, my countrymen, is the worst, or best (which you please), of it is that the decadence is universal."

THE GRAVE OF KING RICHARD III.—A memorial has just been erected at Bow-bridge, Leicester, which is composed of the identical stone that lie the remains of King Richard III. It is a very handsome stone, set in the gable of one of the new buildings. The monument is in Ketton stone, designed by [illegible] Hunt and Stenton, and executed in the Gothic style by Mr. Broadbent, the work in each case being presented as a free gift.—Leicester Journal.

IMPRISONMENT BY A COMMERCIAL TRAVELLER AT LEEDS.—At the Leeds Court House, lately, a respectable-looking man, of middle age, named Wm. Sewell, was charged with embezzling, while the property of his employer, Mr. Wm. Jowett Clough, corn-miller, Farnley, near Leeds. The prisoner, who is very respectably connected, has been for the last month Mr. Clough's confidential agent. Lordship was induced from the prisoner in which he admitted his deficiencies. The case was remanded. The prisoner's defalcations, it is said, have been caused by successful speculations in a great lottery at Frankfort-on-the-Maine.

"HANDSOMELY REWARDED!"—On New Year's day a young woman named Elizabeth Bray, of 31, Fairfax street, Bradford, near Bradford, [illegible] a large sum of money, telling her that if she were silent she should have a share. He was allowed to depart with it; but, becoming uneasy at the circumstance, Elizabeth Bray communicated the fact of the matter to the authorities at the police-station, Bradford, at six o'clock on Saturday morning. On instituting an inquiry on Saturday forenoon detective Shuttleworth ascertained that young Ambler had consulted him as to the legality or otherwise of the bag and its contents, and had returned both to the owner, Mr Martin Sutcliffe, cattle-dealer, of Elizabeth-street, Little Horton-lane, whose name was found on some of the bills which were amongst the money. The contents of the bag amounted to not less than £3000 in gold, bank notes, cheques, and bills, and Mr. Sutcliffe "rewarded" Ambler by giving him £5. An intimation was also received at the Bradford police-station that he would reward Elizabeth Bray "if she would call upon him." The reward she received was 10s.

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. BROTHERTON, M.P.—Mr. Joseph Brotherton, M.P. for Salford died very suddenly on Wednesday morning, about five minutes to eleven o'clock, while riding in an omnibus from his residence at Pendleton to keep an engagement which he had made in Manchester that morning. Mr. Brotherton had been suffering from an affection of the heart for some time, and had consulted Dr. Hervey, but was in his usual apparent health up to the time he entered the omnibus, and had on the previous day presided as a magistrate at the Salford Police Court. In the omnibus with him were his friends, Sir John Potter and Sir Elkanah Armitage, and they were in conversation for nearly a mile of the way from Pendleton, during which Mr Brotherton accepted an invitation from Sir John Potter to spend an evening with him next week, when a sudden change in the countenance of the honmember attracted the attention of Sir John, marked by a wild and vacant gaze at the top of the omnibus. "Look at Mr. Brotherton." he observed, "how ill he looks;" and immediately afterwards Mr. Brotherton reclined heavily backwards, as though for support. The omnibus was just passing the Crescent at the time, and Sir John becoming seriously alarmed for his friend desired that the omnibus should at once be stopped. With the assistance of a gentleman present Mr. Brotherton was carried into Mr. Statham's, surgeon, in the Crescent, but the time had already gone by when any human aid could prevail; and it is believed the hon. gentleman had ceased to exist before he was carried out of the omnibus. He died at the advanced age of seventy-three years ACCIDENT TO THE SUBMARINE CABLE ACROSS THE CHANNEL.—During the fearful gales of the 4th inst. a ship of 700 tons, heavily laden, lost her anchor in the South Foreland, and driven by the force of the gale and tide, fouled a schooner; she then, becoming more unmanageable, drifted into five fathoms water. An anchor was speedily got on, with forty fathoms of chain attached, but the cable, still impelled by the unusual force of the gale, dragged her anchor until she was suddenly brought up sharply head to wind on opening the western light of the South Foreland. It is feared that she here came upon the Submarine Company's Ostend cable; the hurricane prevailing, however, coupled with the tide, the weight of the ship, and the necessity of her keeping head to the sea, she was forced to drift into deep water, and so much upon the submarine line, that after her holding for some length of time, the cable giving way as is supposed, she instantly swung round before the wind, and was careering forward with increased momentum, when she was suddenly brought up head to wind again by the Calais cable. The Largue was held, in spite of the heavy sea, the gale, and the pressure of the wind on her sails, for about an hour, when once more she broke away and sailed off down the Channel. Both submarine lines unfortunately became unworkable, in consequence of this untoward accident, and communication with the Continent was partially stopped. The sea at the point where the vessel cast the cables is about fourteen fathoms deep only, and the spot is within three-quarters of a mile of the shore.

THE BOGUE FORTS.

BOMBARDMENT OF CANTON.

(From a Correspondent.)

CANTON, November 13, 1856.

IT is wonderful to see how small a spark creates a large flame. Our amicable relations with China, at a critical period of its history, are fast merging into hostilities of which it is difficult to see the end; and the open rupture which has already taken place arises merely from the seizure of Chinese criminals by Chinese officials. The British lorcha Arrow, manned by a Chinese crew, anchored off the city of Canton. It appears that one of the crew gave evidence to the Mandarins against some of his comrades, as being connected with rebels. The authorities, instead of first applying to the British Consul to seize the men, took the initiative, and captured the whole crew, hauled down the British flag, and took the prisoners into the city. The master of the lorcha was not on board. The Consul was informed of the seizure, at once applied for the prisoners to be returned on board the lorcha, and that an apology be made for the infraction of our treaty rights, and the insult to the British flag. No apology was given, and the men were sent to the Consulate in chains, but not, as was required, placed on board of the lorcha. They were, consequently, not received, and the Consul, under instructions from Sir John Bowring, placed the settlement of the question in the hands of Admiral Sir Michael Seymour. A correspondence took place between the Admiral and Yeh, the Imperial High Commissioner, Sir Michael demanding an interview, so that affairs might the more readily be adjusted, and claimed the privilege for all foreign officials to have right of access to the authorities in the city at all times, to prevent a recurrence of such hostile measures as have frequently had to be resorted to to enforce the simple and just claims of the British Plenipotentiary. The whole foreign community agreed in the correctness of Sir Michael's demands, and doubted not that if they were obtained the result would likely be of permanent satisfaction.

With a deliberateness and moderation which do great credit to the Admiral's good judgment and humanity, the operations commenced to compel the Governor-General Yeh to treat the Admiral's demands with consideration were carried on step by step in such a manner that the people could scarcely fail to discover that the hostilities were directed solely against the Government and not against them. The forts on the river were taken. This was followed by shelling the Governor-General's residence and the forts at the north of the city. Then the wall was breached, and Canton for the first time was entered by British troops. The palace was visited by Sir Michael in person, and the Chinese said that even with 500 men their defences were worthless, and their city, which never before fell but to treachery, could be boldly defied by our sailors and marines, without the assistance of regular troops at all. Our force was not large enough to maintain a position in the city, nor was such ever attempted. The Admiral paid the official visit he intended, then retired, and informed Yeh that he had called at his official residence, but found that he was out. The next step was a hazardous one, but it was successfully accomplished. The Government offices in the city were shelled, the rest of the city being spared. The effect of the shells was not as destructive as might have been wished, but the practice was excellent. The different courts must soon have been tenantless. Some of the shells were thrown at a range of over 3000 yards! The part shelled was where the Joss poles are shown in the picture of the Tartar part of the city. The Governor-General's own palace being damaged, it was supposed that he would remove his Court to the Tartar General's or the provincial Governor's. No effect being produced by the operations, so far as Yeh was concerned, the people had an opportunity of seeing his whole fleet, upon which much dependence had been placed, utterly destroyed. It was anchored at the east end of the city, under the walls of a fort called the French Folly. The men were most confident; many had been actively engaged against the rebels, or as pirates, and were accustomed to fighting. The Barracouta, with Commanders Fortescue and Bate on board, assisted by the boats of other ships, under command of Captain Hall, the whole being under the guidance of Commodore Elliot, proceeded against the thirty war-junks and the fort, that were said to be so well prepared. No sooner did the first shot flash from the steamer's guns than the whole mass of guns in the junks and the fort were discharged, pouring out a perfect storm of shot, which tore the rigging of the Barracouta, hulled her unsparingly, and, owing to the position in which she swung to her anchor, she was left for a time almost at their mercy. This gave the Chinese great confidence; but, when at length she could bring her guns to bear, the crash of her shot and shell told fearfully upon the fort and junks; the boats and steam-tender Coromandel also joined in the work of destruction. In less than half an hour the Chinese were driven from their guns, and the fort was in our possession—the junks blazing a bonfire of triumph, and the frequent explosion of their magazine proclaiming to all the country round the dashing victory which had been gained. All the other forts had been taken without the slightest resistance, but this little action gave a zest to the proceedings, and was a good lesson to the Chinese of the inutility of attempting resistance.

The Bogue Forts were manned by the Chinese, and intended to destroy the fleet as the Admiral returned; but, after two days, the whole of these were in our possession. What the Admiral's next operation will be it is difficult to tell. He has scarcely men enough to occupy the city, and his measures have been directed so positively against the Government that it is very improbable that he would attempt to destroy the city, or even take it, when he has not sufficient force to protect the people. All these difficulties arise from the bad policy of the British Government not long ago insisting upon an entrance into the city, and submitting to a series of insults from the Mandarins. This has long been foreseen; and it is fortunate that we have now, in Sir Michael Seymour, got an officer who is not likely to stay proceedings till his point is carried.

The people do not appear to be against us, and some of the wealthiest native merchants do not hesitate to condemn Yeh's obstinacy, feeling, as they do, satisfied in the humanity of our proceedings. Mr. Consul Parkes has taken every possible means to spread the true account of the Admiral's intentions and Yeh's replies to his demands among the native population; and with a successful result, so far as we can see. We are, indeed, lucky in many of the officers actively engaged. Consul Parkes understands the Chinamen, perhaps, better than any of our officials. Wade, the interpreter to the Plenipotentiary, is here too, to assist in his department. Commander Bate seems to be the Admiral's right-hand man: he certainly manages admirably. When the French Folly was taken he left the marines and sailors to do the demolishing, and coolly sat on the top, taking angles for positions of buildings in the city. Captain Hall has command of the shore force, and is everywhere. The Commodore, too, works away incessantly, but quietly, and shirks no danger.

It will be long before trade is resumed; and we have yet to see the effect the present position of the Mandarins will have upon the rebels. They are ready to take advantage of the increased weakness of the Government; but the southern insurgents are scarcely strong enough themselves to form any stable ruling power, and have as yet no leader that commands the respect of the people. If the Tai-pung-wang rebels had only some troops near enough to annex the province of Kwang-tung to the other parts of the empire held by them, the people here would have less to suffer. We shall probably find that the very weakness of the Government, now struck so severely, will reduce it to utter helplessness, and the country become in a worse state than when it was overrun by the rebel bands two years ago. We may yet have to become the protectors of the people, and thereby gain a footing which would be of boundless advantage.

The Admiral is certainly more than ordinarily well prepared to act against the Chinese Government, and it has been the subject of some discussion whether or not the orders he has from home have not been such as to lead him to take advantage of any opportunity that may arise to strengthen our position and obtain fresh mercantile advantages in China. It may be that the recent rumour of the Russians having made a new treaty with the Emperor has influenced him, for we have it from Pekin that the Russians are to aid Hien Fung in conquering the rebels at Nankin, &c.; for which service they are to bring out steamers, and in return get a grant of Chusan or one of the neighbouring islands. This would give them a winter harbour in the Pacific, and lead probably to forts and arsenals there which could not but seriously jeopardise our trade with China, should unhappily any rupture with Russia again occur.

Yeh is noted for his barbarity. Upwards of 100,000 people were executed by him in this city alone in about six months during the rebellion. But we were surprised to find that he knew so little of civilised warfare, after all the lessons the Chinese have had, to offer rewards all through the province calling for foreign heads to be brought to his office. The Admiral remonstrated with him, and, in reply, he said it was the people who offered the rewards. This the old Hong merchants are very angry at, and, unfortunately for Yeh's veracity, one of the proclamations offering the reward was found in his own name close to his official residence. Already attempts have been made to seize foreigners in other parts of the province. Should Yeh's instructions be carried to other provinces nothing but a general war with China can follow. However, it is doubtful if the Viceroys of Fokien and the Two Kiang would second the Imperial Commissioner's views.

November 14.

We have news from the Bogue. The forts were well manned, but have all been taken, with only the loss of one man and three wounded on our side. The chief Mandarin was asked to surrender, but answered that, though he was sorry to have to fight against the English, he must obey his instructions. After the men were driven from their guns every effort was made to prevent the further destruction of life; many were picked up in the water, and taken to the mainland. The Mandarins had removed all boats from the island forts, so as to force the men to fight.

There is a Sketch of the city herewith, taken from the terrace on the Oriental Bank, showing the forts at the north, and the position of the Government offices in the Tartar city that were shelled. Also a Sketch of the breach opposite the Governor-General's Ya-mun, taken from the Dutch Folly, where the breaching battery was laid.

The Chinamen seem to be afraid of his burning the city, and go so far as to say that they hope we will give them notice three or four days before, so little do they seem to trust their own soldiers.

There was an abortive expedition towards the French Folly this afternoon (Nov. 14); nothing was done, perhaps because it was no worth while. I could see but very few men in the forts, though the guns were remounted.

The London Gazette of Tuesday last contains despatches from Rear-Admiral Seymour, with a great number of inclosures, giving details of the late operations at Canton. The principal features have been already published. It appears, however, that the twelve men who were forcibly taken by the Chinese authorities from the colonial vessel Arrow were eventually sent back, but it was not in a public manner in which they were carried away, and as all appearance of an apology was pointedly avoided, they were not received by the British Consul. A bold attempt was made by the Chinese to destroy the ships by fire-rafts; and but for the promptitude with which the Barracouta slipped her cable, disastrous consequences might have ensued. Rear-Admiral Seymour took the opportunity which had arisen from the affair of the Arrow to demand also the admission of foreigners into Canton, according to treaty; but up to Nov. 14th the demands had not been complied with.

The health of the men was remarkably good, and the British squadron continued in an efficient state for any further service.

Rear-Admiral Seymour expresses his entire approval of the officers and men engaged in the operations, and he thanks the British and foreign communities for their cordial support, and the United States commanders for the good order and harmony which they contributed to preserve. He also particularises the zeal and gallant conduct of several of his officers.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS—FROM ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

CANTON RIVER.

The view on Canton River (looking down stream) is taken from just above the foreign factories, which are shown on the left. In the gardens between the factories and the river is the English and American church. The river front of the gardens is defended by a strong palisade, with a gate; the rest of the factories is surrounded by a wall.

Nearly opposite is the Red Fort, so called from the lower half of it being painted of that colour. Two other round forts, called the Dutch and French Follies, guard the river towards the eastern end of the town. In the middle, opposite the factories, usually lies an English war-steamer, as a protection to the foreign residents. The river is crowded with boats, and above and below the factories, where it is a little wider, they are moored in two lines of junks. These do not move about, but are inhabited by families who have no houses on land; others ply about these floating streets and supply them with provisions, making a most busy and motley scene.

VIEW OF THE CITY OF CANTON.

This view was taken from a hill at the back of Canton. The sketcher walked round the outside of the city, and, leaving the factories on the west side, threaded the narrow streets of the suburbs, and then came to the open country at the back of Canton. A little way beyond, on a hill, was a small fort entirely commanding the city. Ascending the hill, the Artist seated himself on the steps of the fort and took the sketch; but thought it somewhat of a risk, as it is a dangerous thing to walk round the city at all. The prospect was a very extensive one, embracing, in addition to the whole of Canton, the river with its numerous branches, and the fort and country beyond; and the course of the stream could be traced down to Whampoa, the tall pagoda near which was plainly visible. Canton appeared one mass of red roofs, with but few buildings rising above the rest. The wall is built with regular courses of squared stone, mixed with rubble work, and is strengthened here and there with towers. The distance round is said to be nine miles; and the walls can be traced among the houses for a considerable distance, cutting off a large portion of the suburbs. The city gates are low archways, with a cannon in a tow over them.

THE BOGUE FORTS

The Bogue Forts command the entrance to the Pearl River, which runs up to Canton. The hills here rise up steep from the river, particularly on the north side, where most of the forts are situated. They are of great extent—a long straight fortification, running along the shore, and others up the hillsides—and in the hands of an enemy with any dea of military science would be very formidable. Since the war of 1841, when we took them with our ships, they have been strengthened, and now mount some heavy guns. Tiger Island, which also has fortifications on it, lies in the river, opposite the Bogue Forts.

so much need. The journals which speak the sentiments of this party—the same which represented the late Emperor Nicholas as an angel of light, of peace, and of good will; and which still maintain that he would have done a good deed if he had swept the Turks out of Europe—are loud in their denunciations of British power in the East, and hold up Governor Yeh to the admiration and commiseration of the world as the patient and heroic victim of our insolence and rapacity. But no unprejudiced person who carefully reads the despatches, and takes into account all the anterior circumstances which for the last fourteen years have rendered the intercourse of Englishmen with the Chinese at the port of Canton a daily source of ill-feeling, will come to any other conclusion than that the Chinese authorities well merited the castigation they received; that they wilfully and maliciously commenced the quarrel; that their own obstinacy exasperated it as it proceeded; and that, if our Consul and Admiral had vainly submitted to the one insult originally complained of, they would have speedily discovered it to be but one of the links in a long and augmenting series. By the Treaty of 1842 it was expressly stipulated that in case of any misunderstanding or dispute whatsoever in which the honour of the British flag, or the rights or liberties of British subjects, or persons under the protection of Great Britain, were involved, the British authorities should have free access to the Chinese in the five ports which were, by that treaty, thrown open to British commerce. In four out of these five ports the stipulations of the treaty have been observed. In four out of these five ports such a difficulty as that which arose in the matter of the lorcha, under British colours, illegally seized by the Chinese police would have been satisfactorily adjusted without the firing of a shot. But at Canton—whose fierce, intractable population, and whose pig-headed Governors, have always evaded compliance with the treaty whenever it was possible, and who at last set it at complete defiance—a small dispute unfortunately grew into a large one. If, at the last moment left him for decision, Governor Yeh had consented to an interview with Admiral Seymour, and thus acknowledged and conformed to the treaty, the difficulty would have been surmounted, and Great Britain and China would not at this moment have been at war.

The Chinese are a great people in their own way. They have reached a much higher stage of civilisation than those who call them barbarians are aware of. They are rich, intelligent, and industrious, and, like many other nations nearer home, are far in advance of their Government both in intellect and in good feeling. As far as the people can (always excepting the savage and vindictive people of Canton) they are breaking down the barrier of exclusiveness which shut them from the rest of the world, and many of them in Australia and in California have made themselves British and American subjects, and entitled themselves to, and fully received the protection of, British and American laws. The Government, of which the head is a Tartar, and therefore a foreign Emperor and representative of a conquering dynasty, lags far behind the people, and maintains a system of hostility towards strangers which is not only insulting and vexatious, and inimical to trade and peaceful intercourse, but, in the case which has occurred at Canton, in direct violation of the faith of treaties with this country. The next mail will doubtless inform us whether Yeh has been supported by the central authority at Pekin, or deprived of his office for the mischievous mistake which he committed. It certainly will not be wise in the Emperor, at a time when his empire is devastated by a sanguinary and long-protracted civil war, to court hostilities with a Power like England; and it is probable that Yeh will be disavowed and dismissed, and the relations of the English and the Chinese at Canton placed on a more satisfactory footing. If not, the course of this country is clear, Though the English Government must regret the necessity of war, it must bring the Chinese authorities to reason, for the sake of future peace. If Yeh and his abettors could by any chance gain the victory in this matter we might bid farewell to Canton, which would no longer be a safe residence for a European. Such a result is simply impossible. Canton is at the mercy of our arms, as indeed is every other city on the vast seaboard of China which our commanders might judge it necessary to attack. No Englishman desires to "annex" any portion of the Chinese territory, or seeks for anything from China, except a more extended trade and a more peaceful intercourse; and, in spite of an obstinacy which looks like stohdity on the part of Governor Yeh, it is most likely that the present misunderstanding will eventuate in results satisfactory to both nations.

THE COURT.

There has been little variety in Court movements this week. A few military officers have been honoured with invitations to the Royal table; but the usual hospitalities of the season cannot yet be said to have commenced.

On Sunday the Queen and the Prince the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, Princess Alice, and Princess Helena the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court and the domestic household attended Divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor officiated. The Duchess of Kent and Princess Amelie of Hohenlohe-Schillingfurst were also at the service.

On Monday the Queen and the Prince walked in the Home Park, and visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore. The Prince of Wales went out hunting. The Princes of Leiningen and the Earl and Countess Granville dined with her Majesty in the evening.

On Tuesday the Queen and the Princess Royal walked in the Home Park. The Prince Consort, accompanied by the Prince and Prince Edward of Leiningen, went out shooting. Earl Granville accompanied his Royal Highness. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty. In the evening the Hon. Charles A. Gore and Major-General Sir Henry Barnard dined with her Majesty.

On Wednesday the Queen walked in the grounds adjoining the Castle, accompanied by the Prince of Wales. His Royal Highness Prince Albert went out shooting, accompanied by Earl Granville and the Hon. Charles Gore. The Duke and Duchess of Nemours visited her Majesty.

The Hon. Lucy Kerr and the Hon. Mary Bulteel have succeeded the Countess Byng and the Hon. Emily Cathcart as Maids of Honour in Waiting.

His Excellency the Ambassador of France left town on Tuesday for Broadlands on a visit to Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston.

His Excellency the Hanoverian Minister left London on Monday, on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Jersey, at Middleton Park. The Countess Helene Kielmansegge has left town on a visit to the Earl and Countess Howe, at Gopsall, Leicestershire.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Ailesbury have been receiving a family circle at Savernake Lodge, near Marlborough, during the Christmas holidays.

The Earl and Countess Craven have been entertaining a distinguished party during the holidays at Ashdown Park. The gentlemen of the party have had capital sport in the noble Earl's preserves.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

THE SWISS AFFAIR SETTLED.

By a telegraphic despatch from Berne, dated Thursday, we learn that Switzerland accepts the new French proposals, and the Assembly has been convoked for the 14th instant It is understood that England supports those propositions.

A letter from Berne of the 3rd, in the Indépendance of Brussels, says:—

The following is the most trustworthy version of the negotiations for the pacific solution of the question. England, we are assured, completely approves of the last proposition made by the Emperor Napoleon, which is to this effect:—"The Federal Council is requested to release the prisoners solely out of regard for the friendly sentiments of the Emperor The Emperor, in return, engages to endeavour to obtain from the King of Prussia the complete renunciation of Neufchâtel Should the King of Prussia refuse to negotiate on this base the Emperor will oppose any aggression on the part of Prussia against Switzerland, and will defend the independence of Neufchâtel."

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ROYAL BRITISH BANK.—Yesterday (Friday), at half-past twelve, was appointed by the Court of Bankruptcy for hearing arguments disputing the adjudication in bankruptcy in the case of Mr. H Brown, M.P., but owing to the absence of some of the parties interested, the proceeding did not commence till nearly one o'clock. Mr. Browne, instructed by Messrs. Linklater, appeared for the assignees of the Royal British Bank, the petitioners in the case, and Mr. Roxburgh for Mr. Brown. Mr. Browne said, that he was afraid that he should not be able to establish the petitioning creditor's debt to day, as some of the witnesses were out of the way, therefore he proposed to go on with other parts of the case. Mr Roxburgh objected that the first step was to prove the petitioning creditor's debt. His Honour said Mr Browne must prove his case: he (his Honour) did not understand it, they were confusing it at the very beginning. In answer to questions by his Honour, Mr. Linklater said that they had got the bank books and the pass book, and a clerk of the bank was present. His Honour: Then call him. Mr. Linklater said the witness could prove payment of some of the cheques. It was alleged that Mr Brown owed the bank £70,000, but it had been denied that he owed a shilling. The adjudication was ultimately annulled.

THE INCOME-TAX.—A public meeting of the inhabitants of Cordwainers' Ward was held on Monday, at the Crown Tavern, Bowlane, when resolutions were unanimously passed, calling for an early modification of the Income-tax.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS.—A meeting of the Fellows held by Commissari Majori was held at the College, Trafalgar-square, on Monday afternoon, at four o'clock, when Dr. Thomas Mayo, of Wimpole-street, Cavendish-square, was unanimously elected President of the College. Dr. Mayo was created Elect Consiliarius in 1836; Censor in 1835, 1838, and 1850; Lumleian in 1839 and 1849; Harveian Orator in 1841; Consiliarius in 1838, 1842, 1848 and 1852; and Croonian Lecturer in 1833.

ST. PETER'S, STEPNEY.—On Wednesday evening (last week) about 750 children were entertained at the school-rooms connected with St Peter's, Stepney, and treated to cake, tea, oranges, nuts, and a toy for each child. The treat was given at the desire and cost of Miss Burdett Coutts. On the evening of the New Year 250 of the poor—the halt, the maimed, and the blind—of the district were regaled at an excellent feast of roast beef and plum-pudding, at the expense of the same benevolent lady. The latter feast was honoured by the presence of Miss Burdett Coutts and her friends, the Countess of Falmouth and Mrs. Brown. The Rev. T. J. Rowsell, in a very appropriate speech, explained the purpose for which the noble rooms were built. Miss Burdett Coutts gave £500 towards the building fund, and the remainder (except £240 still unpaid) was collected by the great exertions of the Rev. T. I. Rowsell, the Minister of St. Peter's. The joy and happiness of the poor was delightful to witness The district, containing 13,000 souls, is chiefly inhabited by the labouring poor, among whom the minister is making an earnest effort to spread the blessings of the Gospel.

THE NEW CHURCH OF ST. PETER NOTTING-HILL, was consecrated on Wednesday by the Bishop of London, who, upon his arrival, was received by the Archdeacon of Middlesex, the Rev. Dr. Irons, Incumbent of Brompton; the Rev. J. P. Gell, Incumbent of St. John's, Notting-hill; the Rev. L. P. Boyle, Vicar of Hammersmith; the Rev. J. Francis Resker, Incumbent of St. Barnabas, Kensington; the Rev. T. P Hoditch, Incumbent of St. James's, Norland; the Rev. Thomas Pearson, Incumbent of St. Mary's, West Brompton; the Rev. Messrs. Tagg, Ciberby, Sotton, Neville, and a large number of the principal laity of the neighbourhood. The Archdeacon of Middlesex presented to the Bishop a petition praying him to consecrate the church, to which his Lordship assented, and the usual ceremony was proceeded with, the sermon being preached by the Bishop. A district for the new church has been assigned out of the parish of Kensington, and the incumbency has been conferred upon the Rev. F. H. Addams, of Trinity College, Cambridge, late Curate of St. John's, Notting-hill.

THE lady seatholders of the temporary church of St. Luke, Camden-road, Holloway, recently subscribed the sum of £21 18s., which was presented to the incumbent, the Rev. H. Hampton, M.A., on his birthday, the 1st inst., as a mark of their appreciation of the zeal and efficiency evinced by him in the discharge of his duties.

THE SWISS IN LONDON.—A meeting of the Swiss residing in London was held on the 2nd inst., at Radley's Hotel, Blackfriars, for the purpose of addressing the Federal Council of Switzerland, in reference to the threatened attack by Prussia. Nearly 300 persons were present, and the aspect of the meeting was in thorough unison with the patriotism which has been exhibited in all the cantons of Switzerland. The chair was taken by Mr. John Rapp, Consul-General of the Swiss Confederation in London. Before the meeting separated it was announced that the subscription, independently of £540 raised at Liverpool, already amounted to £1781. The address to the Federal Council of Switzerland was signed by upwards of 180 persons

COFFEE AND EATING HOUSE KEEPERS' ASSOCIATION.—The members of this benevolent institution, established to provide for its members in the decline of life or temporary adversity, held their annual ball at the Freemasons' Tavern last Monday; and, judging from the attendance—between 200 and 300 ladies and gentlemen being present—there is no doubt the result will add materially to the funds at the disposal of the committee.

THE STORM OF SATURDAY AND SUNDAY.—On Saturday evening the metropolis and neighbourhood experienced one of the most violent storms of wind that have occurred for some years. Great damage was done on the river to barges and other craft, many vessels being driven into collision with each other, while large trees in the parks and ornamental woods along the line of the South-Western Railway have been stripped of their branches. A man who was lighting the lamps on the Southwark Bridge was hurled from his ladder and had his arm broken; and a house in Long Alley was blown down by the force of the hurricane A large amount of property has been destroyed, and much loss of life by shipwreck has taken place along the coast. On the Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Railway the express train due from Oxford at half past eight was nearly an hour and a half behind its time, owing to the severe hurricane having blown down the telegraph posts, which, together with the wires, were precipitated on to the line. Some of the windows of the express train carriages were broken in the fall. So great was the violence of the wind that the passengers by the express were unable to open the doors of the carriages in consequence of the pressure of the wind upon them.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN LONDON.—In the week that ended on Saturday the deaths of 1497 persons—viz., 761 males and 736 females were registered in London. The decline now recorded is the extent of 44 over the corrected average. Last week the births of 1025 boys and 948 girls—in all 1973 children—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1847-56 the average number was 1636.

THE CITY OF LONDON UNION FRAUDS.—From the report of Mr. Morgan, the accountant appointed to examine the books of the City of London Union, it appears that the defalcations of Paul, the assistant clerk, so far as they have been ascertained up to the present time, amount to £17,524. In addition it has been found by the guardians that there is scarcely an instance in which he has not committed some fraud in connection with the accounts of the tradesmen and contractors by whom the union has been supplied with goods. It is probable, therefore, as he had filled the same post for a great number of years, that the totals now capable of being traced will very inadequately represent the full amount of his delinquencies. One feature belonging to this case equally characterised those of Robson and Redpath. While Mr. Paul was intrusted with the disbursement of sums amounting annually to many thousand pounds, free from the exercise of the slightest supervision, his salary was limited to £200 a year. He had formerly failed in the corn trade, and his habits were doubtless expensive Robson, while indulging in the purchase of horses at 300 guineas each, was assumed to be working honestly on a salary of £150; and Redpath, who has attained middle age, and whose expenditure was proportionably of a broader character, is stated to have received only £300. Paul was brought up at the Mansion-house for further examination on Thursday, when a new charge of having stolen a cheque for £488 12s. 2d. was brought against him. Several witnesses having been called in support of the charge, the prisoner was remanded till next Friday.

SIR ROBERT PEEL'S OPINIONS ABOUT RUSSIA.

On Monday last Sir Robert Peel delivered a lecture on Russia at Adderley Park, near Birmingham. We are sorry that our limited space forbids our giving a full report of his amusing remarks. But the following passages will give some notion of it. Talking of the fortresses in the Baltic, Sir Robert said: "I proceeded up the Baltic, when in the year preceding, such mighty fleets were assembled, I passed along the shores of Finland, and arrived within gunshot of that great fortress which Sir C. Napier did not take (Loud cheers, laughter, and hisses). Sometimes express dissent from what I state, but I believe it is strictly and literally true (Laughter). I saw that mighty fortress rising before us. I reflected naturally upon the past, and upon the great distinction that might have resulted from any successful operations against it."

THE KERTCH MUSEUM.

Another palace is called the Hermitage, having a famous collection of pictures, originally known as the Walpole Collection. I went to view the pictures one Sunday afternoon. The man in charge of the collection pointed my attention to a quantity of works of art, and said, "Here is the Kertch Collection." I said, "I thought they were all taken by our people" (Laughter). To which he replied, "Oh no; they were removed by order of the Emperor two years ago." That shows the generalisation of the man (Cheers). Those pictures had been removed at great cost and difficulty from Kertch to St. Petersburg two years before; and this proceeding leaves little doubt on my mind that there was a great design against the liberties of Europe. The Marble Palace is the residence of that frank and open-hearted sailor," Constantine How I laughed when I read that description of Constantine's character (Laughter) You may remember what has been said about the distinguished Admiral Constantine. With all respect to his Highness, I must say that I never saw a man who gave me less of the impression of a "frank and open-hearted sailor" (Cheers and laughter). It is all soft-sawder, you know (Laughter).

RUSSIAN HOTEL CHARGES.

There was not much to keep us in St. Petersburg, for we were so horribly fleeced by our innkeeper (Laughter) I have lived a great deal in that way, but I never in my life came across a man with such enormous ideas of the principles of "doing" (Loud laughter). I am a man who am satisfied with little, but our dinner every night cost us £50 sterling (Roars of laughter). It was perfectly monstrous. When we arrived at Moscow we were wearied, but not hungry, having had plenty to eat, for the quarter of an hour stoppages were apparently made for the express purpose of eating (Laughter).

THE GOVERNOR OF MOSCOW

During the whole time I was in Russia I never saw such a brick as the Governor was (Roars of laughter). While quietly walking over an immense bridge at Nishni, smoking a cigar, I was seized by a Cossack, who nearly wrung my neck off, and who, holding his great weapon over my head, took me prisoner along the streets (Laughter). I could not speak a word to the fierce soldier, and was in something like the same position as the Englishman in France of whom Hood or Mathews sung:—

> Never go to France unless you know the lingo,
> Or else you will, like me, repent of it, by jingo.
> Staring like a fool, silent as a mummy,
> There I stood, looking native like a dummy.

(Bursts of merriment.) We had nothing to sleep on, but had plenty to drink. I never saw a man with such a capacity for drinking as this brick of a Governor (Laughter); and no matter how much champagne he drank, I did not notice that he ever appeared affected by it (Laughter). He gave us a fête on the Volga.

THE AMBASSADORS AT THE CORONATION.

We were presented at the coronation by Count Morny, the French Ambassador—a spick-and-span man of considerable aplomb, and who, by the way, is one of the greatest speculators in the world. He speculates in everything, and bought a lot of pictures to sell again and make a profit of. Next to Count Morny stood the representative of a country which deserves the sympathies of all civilised people, Sardinia (Cheers) General Dabormida. Then came the Ambassador of the smallest kingdom in Europe, Belgium, the Prince de Ligne, the very picture of swelling insignificance —so swelling, indeed, that he could not for the life of him look down from the contemplation of his own importance. Then there was that fine specimen of a man, Prince Esterhazy, the representative of Austria. Then the representative of Naples, of whom, in charity, I will say nothing. Then the Turkish representative, a clever Turk. Of course he was not admitted into the church. At the same time, you could not look at him without feeling that he was the representative of an effete and worn-out nation. It was impossible for Turkey to long resist the aggression of Russia without assistance" Then came the Papal representative, and, finally, that of this country, Lord Granville, than whom no one could more thoroughly represent a true Englishman. He was the representative of the most powerful nation of the world, yet plainly dressed.

RUSSIAN IMPROVEMENTS

What I wish to impress upon you is, that you should not throw away your money to improve the internal condition of a country which will turn the benefits you confer to their own advantage (Cheers). I know not whether I have afforded some little entertainment, but if I have I am well pleased, and shall be glad to devote my little abilities at any time to your service. I would close my observation, with this sentiment, which cannot fail to be that of every one who hears me; great as Russia is, when I contrast it with the power of my own country, I would ten thousand times sooner repose in the lap of Britannia, the humblest citizen in the land, than own the allegiance or bow the knee to the power that sways the sceptre in Russia.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

IN consequence of the large number of troops who were required in the Crimea during the late war the authorities at the War-office were unable to complete the regiments serving in India to their proper establishment, but the Duke of Cambridge has now given directions for the whole of the regiments on the Indian establishment to be raised to their war strength as early as possible. With this view volunteering has been commenced from all those regiments on the home station which are above the prescribed establishment, and recruiting is also proceeding vigorously, being the intention of the authorities to have the Indian regiments completed before the season for the embarkation of draughts from this country arrives. Upwards of 600 volunteers have arrived at the Provisional Battalion, Chatham, for the purpose of joining the various Indian depôts of that garrison, the whole of whom will undergo a course of instruction in the use of the Enfield rifle.

ON Monday last 235 men of all ranks arrived at Chatham from regiments stationed in Ireland, as volunteers to those corps at Chatham garrison which are below their prescribed establishment.

ALL the mortar-vessels moored off Hardway (Gosport shore) have been shifted out into Portsmouth harbour stream on account of their standing foul of the ships of the line and others moored in ordinary when the wind is from the westward. The wind having shifted round to the N.E., on Monday and Tuesday, the whole of the outward bound fleet, consisting of the Hecla, Sphinx, and St. Helen's got away, with the exception of the American ship Zurich, detained at the Motherbank by a refractory crew

A SEVERE test of Clifford's apparatus for lowering boats at sea was made on Saturday last, in the gale then blowing, by Admiralty order, from H.M.S store-ship Dee. While she was steaming at full speed, her starboard cutter, which had been fitted with Clifford's lowering apparatus, and was hanging immediately abaft the paddle-box, was manned with her full crew (nine men), and instantly and safely unlashed, lowered, and entirely freed from the ship by one of the crew only in the boat. It was a very severe test to subject the plan to a more severe trial from the severity of the gale.

LIFE-BOAT SERVICES.—Some of the life-boats of the Royal National Life-boat Institution have, during the awful gales which visited the coast on Sunday last, been instrumental in saving many lives from shipwreck. On that day the Hauxley (Northumberland) life-boat, manned by twelve watermen, put off and rescued the crew of eleven men from the schooner Sophie, of Oporto. The sea was at the time making a complete breach over the vessel, which soon afterwards went to pieces Later in the day the national life-boat Institution has just placed on that important station, saved the crew of eight men of the Reliance, of London, which was driven on shore by the gale near Walmer Castle. It is sincerely hoped that in the great and extraordinary exertions which this truly philanthropic society is now making to supply exposed points with efficient life-boats, liberal public support will be extended to it. It should be remembered that a life-boat establishment, with its boat, carriage, house, and life-boats for the crew, cost about £350.

THROUGH BOOKING BETWEEN EUROPE AND AMERICA.—Mr. [illegible] manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, has arrived in London for the purpose of making arrangements for his "through booking" system between Europe and America. [illegible] hope to any [illegible] Agreements have been made by Mr. Brydges with the railways of the United States by which passengers, whether [illegible] or otherwise, will be passed to any part of the United States and Canada.

ASHTON COURT FESTIVITIES—THE LAST DAY OF THE SPORTS—SKITTLED IROE LONG AT THE GATE

MAJORITY OF J. H. GREVILLE SMYTH, ESQ.

THE BIRTHDAY CAKE.

SHTON COURT the ancestral seat of the Smyth family, three miles from Bristol, has just been the scene of genuine old English festivity, to celebrate the coming of age of Mr. J. H. Greville Smyth, the youthful owner of the Ashton Court and Heath House estates, who attained his majority, and assumed possession of the rich inheritance which has descended to him through an ancient line, on Friday (last week). The occasion has been celebrated in a manner becoming the wealth and distinction of the young squire; and the rejoicings, although they may be said to have culminated upon the ancestral demesne, have extended their influence to other parts of the neighbourhood. A widespread hospitality has been extended to the rich, but, at the same time, a generous disposition has been manifested towards the needy

In celebration of the majority was commenced soon after midnight. A park of artillery was stationed on the hill near the "tump," and their thunder breaking upon the stillness of the night announced that the legal time of probation had passed. The bells of the old church rang merrily; and, as the morning advanced, the towers of St. Mary Redcliff, St. Stephen, Christ Church, St. Nicholas, and St. Mark, in Bristol, and from many a neighbouring village steeple, pealed forth their joyous welcome. The inhabitants of the neighbourhood were early astir: triumphal arches were built, flags unfurled, and everything was made to wear a gala face. Thousands flocked, as the day progressed, towards the spot where the principal doings were announced to take place; and at five o'clock in the evening the anticipated bonfire and fireworks attracted such crowds that the road leading from the Angel, at Ashton, to Redcliffe-hill exhibited an unbroken line of sight-seers. At intervals along the line of route tokens of rejoicing were displayed. A triumphal arch gaily dressed with evergreens and flowers spanned the highway from the Star Tavern to the hauling-way to Gummer's Colliery. Another crossed the main road near the lower lodge, composed of laurels and ivy on a framework of fir and larches, and bore upon it a large white tablet, on which was inscribed, in illuminated letters of silver, blue, and crimson, "Welcome to the home of thy ancestors." The Lodge itself was ornamented. At the Angel Inn was a third triumphal arch, bearing the inscription "Long life to him." From the top of the old court flourished the St. George's ensign; while the principal entrance-gate was tastefully decorated with the flags of some score friendly nations, supporting a white medallion inscribed with the word "Welcome."

Mr. Smyth's tenants assembled at ten o'clock in the morning at the Angel Inn, to make preparations for presenting to him an address of congratulation. Soon after eleven o'clock the tenants present, to the number of about 300, formed in procession, and, headed by Hinton's Clarence band, proceeded with their address to the Court. They entered by the lower lodge, and wound their way along the carriage-drive to the principal entrance, near to which a large concourse of persons had before assembled. Mr. Greville Smyth was in waiting upon the terrace, accompanied by his mother and sister, by the Rev. H. Wray, and some other members of his family. The tenants having formed in front of the terrace, and enjoying heartily cheered their new landlord.

Mr. Shattock then presented the address, to which Mr. Smyth having replied came in front of the entrance, and mounting the top of a large barrel of strong beer specially brewed for the occasion, drank a bumper to the health of his tenants, who also in turn drunk "long life, happiness, and prosperity" to him.

The procession then re-formed, and proceeded to the tump on Ashton Hill for the purpose of partaking of the tenants' dinner, which had been furnished by subscription among themselves. The dinner, to which about 250 gentlemen sat down, was held in a spacious marquee erected for the purpose. The repast was supplied by Mr. E. Allen, of the Angel Inn, Bristol. The chair was taken by Mr. Shattock, who was supported by J. Nalder, Esq.; H. Bennett, Esq.; the Rev. Mr. Haynes, of Ashton; the Rev. Mr. Coles, of Flax Bourton, &c.

After the removal of the cloth, the Chairman gave the usual loyal and patriotic toasts, which were drunk with honours. He then proposed the toast of the evening, their young landlord's good health, observing, might he live long to enjoy his princely heritage, and might he live, too, in the enjoyment of all happiness himself, and in the hearts of a prosperous and contented tenantry (Cheers). He would propose the health of Mr. Smyth, of Ashton Court." The toast was received with great cheering, which was renewed upon a farmer with stentorian lungs calling out, "Long life and a good wife to him!"

Mr. Eaton returned thanks on behalf of Mr. Smyth. He (Mr. Eaton) could assure them that the good feeling of the tenantry was strongly reciprocated by Mr. Smyth, and it was to be hoped that the present celebration of that day would prove to be a foretaste of a lasting union between the tenantry of Ashton Court and their landlord (Cheers).

"The health of Mr. Arthur Way," "The healths of Mrs. Upton, and happiness to her and her family," and "The health of the Chairman," were then drunk with cheers. After a few other toasts, the company rose.

THE BONFIRE

was lighted at three o'clock, but it was many hours before anything of a blaze was obtained. It was of colossal dimensions, covering an area of 111 feet in circumference, and was composed of 60 cords of wood, 50 tar-barrels, 10 tons of coal, 1500 bundles of faggots, and several waggon-loads of dried fern, underwood, and other inflammable materials. The great altitude at which it was placed enabled it to be seen from elevations many miles distant.

THE FIREWORKS,

by Professor Barn, comprised many flights of fifty rockets each, together with a great number of set pieces, amongst which were the following:—A grand fixed or brilliant piece, which commenced with a number of snakes in pursuit of butterflies, changing to a military ordnance in Chinese fires, then to twelve vertical wheels, displaying crimson and purple lights; and again to a splendid fixed piece, composed of brilliant fires representing five Royal stars, and concluded. A splendid balloon, completely emblazoned in fireworks, after burning some time in the air, burst, the works propelled into the air, and, when at the greatest altitude, discharged an immense quantity of carmine, green, and purple stars, with rockets, Roman candles, jerbs, mines, and other brilliant fireworks.

The arrangements for the ball the invitations to which were on a most extensive scale—were all carried out entirely by the direction of Mr Fitz Way. All the apartments of the Court were brought into requisition. The entrance-halls, lobbies, and staircases were lined with rare flowery shrubs; and the reception-room, supper-room, &c., were decorated with great elegance. The music-hall was also thrown open, and Mr. Frederick Huxtable presided at the great organ, and played with his known skill several fine compositions. The dancing took place in the library, which Messrs. Garaway, Hayes, and Co., of the Durdham down Nurseries, had dressed profusely with wreaths, festoons, and ornaments of evergreens and flowers. Quadrilles, waltzes, &c., followed each other in rapid succession until one o'clock, at which hour the Ball Supper was announced. It was provided by Warren, of Clifton and was of the most sumptuous and recherché character. The repast was held in the old dining-room upon a semicircular, a centre and two side tables. The health of the youthful host was drunk with enthusiasm and acknowledged by him. The company returned to Ball-room and resumed the dance, which was kept up until

We regret we have not room for the full list of the company, among the distinguished persons invited were The Duchess of Beaufort, Lady Carew, Hon. Mrs Eden, Lady Wroughton, Lady Dacre, Lady Lucy, the Hon. Mrs. Rodney, Lady Elton, Lady Smyth, Lady Mary Tollemache, Lady Lucy, Lady Caroline Lucy, the Dowager Lady Stanley of Alderley, Lady Auckland, Lady Caroline Eden, the Dowager Lady Rodney, Lord Hinton, Hon. F. H. Berkeley, M.P., Hon. A. Hugessen, M.P., Hon. P. G. Langton, M.P., W. Miles, M.P., W. Hallett, M.P., R. H. Hale, M.P., and Wilson, M.P.; the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, the Rev. Vernon Ackland, Bishop of Bath and Wells, the Hon. Reginald Capel, Very Rev. Dean of Bristol, Very Rev. Dean of Wells, Sir Walter Carew, Sir John Davis, Sir A. H. Elton, Sir John Fraser, Sir Charles Mordaunt, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir J. E. Eardley Wilmot, Sir [illegible] Young, General Godby, General Worrall, General Cumberland, &c.

It is said that the late Mr. Richard Vaughan Yates' property will be expended in the erection of a People's College, in Prince's-park, Birkenhead.

ILLUSTRATED GIFT-BOOKS.*

ONE of the healthiest indications of the love of books in the present day is the fact of their having become the customary presents at holiday seasons, in place of costly articles of less enduring interest. The change began some thirty years since, with "the Annual," which nearly drove out of the book-market the picture-books, or books, which had formed the illustrated diary and "gurnal" of many a blue-stocking. But the reign of the Annuals was of brief effulgence: their literature grew weak, and the public tired of their sentimentalities, though embellished with steel-plate engravings at the rate of a hundred guineas a page. To the Annuals has succeeded a hardier race of books, mostly consisting of reprints of standard works, or selections from standard authors, produced with the combined advantages of picturesque illustration, fine printing, and the ornate excess of book-binding. Of this class are the choicest Gift-books of the present season. Their exteriors are rich in artistic ornamentation of gold and colour; but, before glancing at the art and literature which they enshrine, we should pay our respects to the last of the brilliant bevy of which we have just spoken, namely,

The Keepsake for 1857, which, under the editorship of Miss Power, maintains its renown for gracefully-written nouvelettes, traits of travel and adventure, and elegant trifles in verse and prose. In the roll of contributors are Mrs. Abdy, Mrs. Barrett Browning, Mrs. Newton Crosland, Mrs. Ward, Mrs. Octavius Freire Owen, and Miss Power. Barry Cornwall sends some lines "To an Old Playmate;" Albert Smith a "Mont Blanc" paper "About Chamois and Hunters;" and Nathaniel Hawthorne a few pages about Dr. Johnson and his father at Uttoxeter—"a shock of the Actual with the Ideal." There are two interesting "Tales of the War;" and Mr. Bennoch has gracefully invested with kindred interest some tributary lines accompanying the portrait of Lady Grey. These notes, however, convey but a scant idea of the varied attraction of the papers. Lady Molesworth, from Thorburn's whole-length miniature; Mrs. Falk, by Desanges; and the Lady Violet, by Margaret Gillies; are the gems of the portrait embellishments, which, with the other illustrations, have been engraved under the careful eye of Mr. Frederick A. Heath.

We now come to the new class of Gift-books, in which highly-finished engraving on wood multiplies to profusion the number and picturesque variety of the subjects; and lourd paper and fine printing heighten their artistic beauty. The first specimen we have is Sir Walter Scott's Lord of the Isles, part of which he composed some two-and-forty years since, in the presence of his family and casual visitors, in his cottage at Abbotsford, "neither conversation nor music seeming to disturb him." The frontispiece is Turner's picture of the majestic sublimity of Skye, delicately engraved on steel by H. Le Keux; the vignette is the same great painter's Staffa, engraved by E. Goodall. The illustrations exceed seventy in number; the figure subjects by John Gilbert, and the localities by Birket Foster, exquisitely engraved on wood by J. W. Whymper and Edmund Evans, and successfully rendering Scott's "glow of colouring, energy of narrative, and amplitude of description." Mr. Gilbert gives us some of the finest impersonations of the story of Bruce and Bannockburn; his vignettes to the cantos are poetic gems; whilst Mr. Foster revels in the rude scenery of Skye and Arran, and the coasts of Argyleshire and Ayrshire; and never had landscape-painter a finer succession of castled crag and ocean wildness than these localities present. The result is a set of charming illustrations. The binding, in red and blue, and gold, and the heraldic emblazonry, have the rich effect of a painted window.

The Book of Job, "the oldest poem in the world," has been illustrated with fifty engravings, from drawings by John Gilbert, with variety and fancy, which has rarely if ever excelled; more especially in the Eastern character of the scenery, and the characteristics of its animal life; the supernatural incidents and localities of the Patriarch's life; its "vivid pictures of the husbandman, the warrior, the traveller, the citizen, the stately magnate, and the starving outcast of that departed era." How picturesquely Mr. Gilbert has embodied the incidental attractions in which the sacred poem is unusually rich it would occupy long to tell: as the Patriarch, in his many phases of sorrow and suffering, of bereavement and despair; the lovely vision of the young daughters, the vast from the whirlwind and the doors of the deep; the charger clothed with thunder, and the leviathan making the deep to boil like a pot; and a score of other scenes and incidents which we have not space to enumerate. The engravings are by Dalziels, Whymper, and Thomas. The editor's chapter of "The Patriarchs and the Poets," and his Explanatory Notes and Poetic Parallels, are characterised by reverential and eloquent feeling. The binding—a rich, Oriental design, in gold upon a blue ground—is extremely beautiful.

Of similar character, though more severe in manner, is The Course of Time, by Robert Pollok, A.M., illustrated with engravings from drawings by Tenniel, Clayton, and Birket Foster; the picturesqueness of the latter artist relieving the pre-Raphaelite designs of his associates. The poet's descriptions of the spiritual life and destiny of man, and his speculative memories of the effects of virtue and vice, are vividly embodied by the artists, with success which, no doubtless, extend the fame of "The Course of Time." From a memoir prefixed to the poem we learn that it was mostly composed by the author in bed; that it has gone through twenty editions; and that the publishers paid for the copyright £2500—"a price greatly exceeding that given for the poems of Scott or Campbell, nearly as large as ever was paid to any poet in the height of his fame." The engravings are nicely executed by the Dalziels, Evans, and Green. The green and gold binding is elegant.

Rhymes and Roundelayes in Praise of a Country Life, Adorned with many Pictures, is the quaint seventeenth-century title of tasteful Selections, principally from the English Poets, grouped under Sunrise and Morning, Spring, Songs of the Birds, Spring Flowers, Summer, Flocks and Herds, Autumn, Harvest, Woods and Streams, Winter, Country Sports, Christmas Tide, Evening and Night. The choice is as judicious as the variety is attractive, ranging from the Fletchers and Herrick to Wordsworth and Thomas Miller. The illustrations consist principally of whole-page scenes in Country Life, drawn by Birket Foster, J. D. Hodgson, Foster, H. Weigall, S. Read, Hulme, with a few figure subjects by Frederick Taylor and John Absolon. The landscape painter is here in great strength, and the book in subject, character, and execution is in pure English taste. The illustrations are engraved by the ornamental inclosure by T. R. Macquoid and Noel Humphreys and Lalique by Lapie. E. Hay; these accessories exhibiting real and appropriate fancy and high-toned graphic effect. Among the larger subjects "A Summer Evening and Sunrise in the Down Side" by Foster, the Bramble-Brake and Hill Scene by Dupuis, the Village Inn, by Foster, Sheep Washing, and the Heron in the Stream," by Weir, the "Child and Mill" by E. Goodall, the "Woodland" by S. Read, the Robin by W. Goodall, and some of the most serious, are of great beauty. The engravers are Evans, Cooper, Whymper, Green, &c. The binding—rich rose and forget-me-not, in gold upon crimson—is in rich taste.

Let the London publishers look well to their laurels. There is a competitor in the field who promises to equal, if not to excel, them in the production of gorgeous books; and this competitor lives and works in a small provincial town, and impresses Hertford, not London, upon his titlepages. Mr. Stephen Austin, the proprietor of the Herts Reformer, and a bookseller in Hertford, has lately devoted much of his time and attention to the publication of works connected with Oriental literature. He undertakes the printing and publication of MSS. in Sanskrit, Bengali, Arabic, Persian, Pushto, Hindústaní, Hindí, Hebrew, and Syriac, as well as of illustrated works in general literature. In token of her Majesty's approval of the skill and good taste shown by him in the illustrations and binding of the Sanskrit drama of "Sakoontala," and the services thereby rendered to the improvement of art, he has received a gold medal from Queen Victoria. He has also received a gold medal from the Empress of the French, as well as the first-class medal of the French Universal Exhibition of 1855. Sakoontala; or, the Lost Ring, the Indian drama, by Kálidása, which has called forth the display of Mr. Austin's taste and judgment as a printer and illustrator, is a work of which the author was contemporary with Virgil. He flourished in India in the reign of Vikramaditya. The beauties of the drama were first made known to the English public by Sir William Jones; but his translation being in prose, and in some respects defective and inelegant, besides being unaccompanied by explanatory notes, a new translation was made by Mr. Monier Williams, the Professor of Sanskrit at Haileybury College. Its merits as a dramatic poem are of a high order. M. De Lamartine, in his "Cours Familier de la Litterature," pronounces it to be "a chef-d'œuvre, at once epical and dramatic, comprising in its action all that is most pastoral in the Bible, most pathetic in Æschylus, and most tender in Racine." As regards typography the volume is a masterpiece of English art. As regards illustration—though the merits of the designs are not to be placed to the credit of English genius, the titles and margins being copied from Indian originals in the library of the East India House, and in the British Museum—the execution is in the highest degree creditable to the taste, the industry, and the mechanical resources of the publisher. For those who desire to possess the volume for its poetical merits, and do not wish to incur the expense of the richly-embellished work, which has gone through two editions, a cheaper reprint, without illustrations, has been issued. It augurs well for the public interest in Indian literature, that in this form "Sakoontala" is in its third edition.

MUSIC.

A NEW CHORAL SOCIETY, in the style of the German Liedertafel, has just been set on foot. The following extract from a prospectus issued by its originators will sufficiently explain its nature and objects:—

Extremely little has yet been done in England towards realising the beautiful and extraordinary effects derivable from large bodies under a perfect state of discipline. With the view of removing this defect, a large number of the ladies and gentlemen who assisted at the performances given by Madame Goldschmidt at Exeter Hall have formed themselves into a large vocal association, on the model of those already referred to. Its constitution will be framed to render it, as far as possible, acceptable to all classes of society; and its practice, it is hoped, will be found equally instructive and agreeable. At its rehearsals the celebrated compositions used by the German associations will be gradually introduced, together with many others less known by Italian and English writers. These will be practised with the most exact and scrupulous care; and it is confidently expected that, in this way, a singing association will ere long be established in London which will rival, if not excel, the best on the Continent. As the model of those already referred to,

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

On Monday last the first cargo of art-treasures was received within the Exhibition building at Manchester. It was a remarkable cargo, containing those long-coveted treasures, the pick of the Meyrick and Douce collections. Case 1 contained a knight on horseback, both in full armour, and twenty men of these degenerate days were barely sufficient to carry Sir Paladin and his steed within the walls of the Exhibition. Case 2—hardly of smaller dimensions—covered three of the finest suits of armour in the collection. Another case contained swords and maces of marvellous workmanship and rarity, wielded in knightly days by men after the model of Richard Cœur de Lion and Lord Herbert of Cherbury. Smaller cases, of every variety of shape and size, carried in marvellous safety caskets of ivory elaborately carved with stories such as Ariosto and Spenser loved to sing, and Froissart to describe in imperishable prose. A richer or more varied first cargo was never admitted within the walls of any exhibition. Every thing—thanks to the diligence and care of Mr. Deane, who watched them from Goderich to Manchester—arrived uninjured. In a case by itself the active and faithful Commissioner brought the very fine Sir Peter Lely of Nell Gwyn with a lamb—a proper pendant to the charming Lely of "La Belle Hamilton," at Hampton Court—and in his deep set pocket, protected by swansdown of the softest and purest kind, he carried (keeping his left hand slightly pressing on his treasure) the two miniatures, by Holbein, of Henry VIII. and Anne of Cleves—those marvellous miniatures, in their original heraldic cases of ivory, which excited the cupidity of Horace Walpole, and drove Dance half crazy with delight. In no other portrait is "that King Hal" seen so fully to the life. He does all but speak to Wolsey or Anne Boleyn; and in no other miniature do we see Anne of Cleves so fair, so fresh—as if three hundred years had passed over her comely looks, as they have done over Holbein's colours, without the faintest indication of decay. The beauty of the Anne of Cleves miniature gave Henry another wife, and cost Cromwell his head. How delightful to see and linger over a miniature like this, exquisite as a work of art, and rich at the same time in historical associations! These miniatures have been seen by very few people. They were not shown at Goderich; and the latest editor of Walpole's anecdotes (Mr. Wornum, the Secretary to the National Gallery) was unacquainted with their whereabouts. Manchester, in May next, will reveal the lurking quarters of many treasures long lost to the most prying and best-informed of collectors.

We are glad to find instructive and agreeable narrators of travel, are not entirely extinct. Mr. Russell (the Special Correspondent of the Times) has the art of telling in a very few words, and those the proper words, the very things best worth telling. But he has a rival this week in Sir Robert Peel, who gallops through Russia in a lecture, and leaves his audience his hearers by the veracity of his manners, the vigour of his descriptions, and the odd kind of skill he indulges in, of skipping from one subject of moment to another of equal interest, but wholly unlike what he has at that moment given the go-by to. Travellers who publish may safely take a lesson of importance from Mr. Russell's "Notes of his Russian Tour," and lecturers (Mr. Thackeray excepted) may copy with advantage the lively manner of Sir Robert Peel.

A private theatre at Tavistock House reads like the announcement in bygone days of private theatricals at Bedford House or Richmond House, with this exception, that when we are aware that Tavistock House is the London residence of Mr. Charles Dickens we are at once assured that a play under his roof and under his superintendence, and with his friends, must be something far more agreeable to sit through than any representation made by people however fashionable, or in houses infinitely larger than the house which Mr. Dickens inhabits. Tuesday last witnessed the first of four nights on which Mr. Dickens treats his friends—a large and influential circle—to a new play from the pen of Mr. Wilkie Collins, and to new scenery from the pencil of Mr. Clarkson Stanfield. The title of the Tavistock House production is "The Frozen Deep;" and Mr. Collins, so say his many admirers, has made a stride in his art in this telling and well-told play. The acting was all but excellent throughout. No professed actors now on the stage could have played with equal ability the parts sustained by Mr. Mark Lemon and Mr. Charles Dickens. The last night is on Wednesday, the 14th inst.

And we are never more to hear the pleasant voice or see the genial smile of little Britton. New Year's Day robbed us of an old friend who has done more than any man of his age to preserve and explain the architectural antiquities of Great Britain. Born with an ardent love of whatever is beautiful in architecture, or venerable in point of antiquity, he possessed at the same time the very rare art of bringing those particular men about him who could most efficiently aid him in his labours. Thus he brought Mackenzie, the most admirable of architectural draughtsmen; and Le Keux, the most inimitable of architectural engravers, to the illustration of his "Cathedral Antiquities"—a noble monument of his taste, his industry, and his tact. If we would fully understand the value of Mr. Britton's services, we must compare his engravings with the works of Buck and Grose, and with the loose illustrations of our antiquities to be found in the last of our county historians. Even the faithful Hollar is faithless when compared with Mackenzie and Le Keux.

THE BALL OF THE BACHELORS' HUNT, which took place recently at the Corn Exchange, Aylesbury, Warwickshire, is said to have passed off with unusual éclat. The company consisted of about 250 of the nobility and gentry whose names were associated with the hunt; and, in order to give full effect to the entertainment, the hall was tastefully decorated with the flags of various nations, and every description of implement and device appertaining to the chase. Amongst the guests were several distinguished Crimean heroes.

The Austrian Commandant in Parma has received orders to evacuate that duchy as soon as the Duchess Regent shall call on him to do so. The Austrians have occupied Parma since 1849.

A DESPATCH from Constantinople of the 2nd inst. states that the English fleet had received orders to prepare to leave the Black Sea for England.

M. de Sevérine, the Russian Envoy at the Court of Bavaria, has just signed at Carlsruhe the contract of marriage of the Grand Duke Michel of Russia with the Princess Cecile of Baden.

THE PARIS AGRICULTURAL EXHIBITION.—The Moniteur announces that the Paris Agricultural Exhibition will, in consequence of the delay of the Exhibition of the Fine Arts for the 15th of June, commence on the 1st and continue to the 30th of that month, as originally designed. The reception and classification of implements, animals, and productions are to take place from the 18th to the 28th of May. From the latter day to the end of May juries will be occupied in awarding the prizes. On the 12th of June and following days experiments will be made with the machines and implements, either in the Exhibition Palace or at Vincennes, near Paris. The sale of the live stock is to take place subsequently. Persons intending to exhibit are required to make known their intention before the 28th of April, either to the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce in Paris, or to the persons of their respective countries authorized to receive their declarations; and they are also required to give as full a description as possible of the animals or objects exhibited.

EXPLOSION OF A NEAPOLITAN WAR STEAMER.—Accounts from Naples of the 8th state that the Neapolitan war-steamer Carlo III., on her voyage to Sicily, exploded, killing a great number of those on board. Many were saved by a British ship of war cruising near the scene of the accident.

THE LIVINGSTON TESTIMONIAL.

A great meeting was held in the Egyptian-hall, Mansion House, on Tuesday last, the Lord Mayor in the chair, the object being to devise the best means of presenting a testimonial to Dr. Livingston, the African traveller. The hall was filled in every part.

The Lord Mayor, in opening the business of the day, said he might venture to assure the company present that the most gratifying event connected with his mayoralty was, that the first meeting in that hall was for the purpose of paying a national tribute of admiration and praise to Dr. Livingston, the great traveller in South Africa (Loud cheers). The importance of Dr. Livingston's travels in South Africa could not sufficiently be appreciated. The labours in which he had been engaged for the last sixteen years as a missionary had enabled him to explore a vast continent hitherto unknown to Europeans, and those labours could not fail to be of the greatest advantage to the civilised world, whether those researches had reference to the spread of Christianity or to the extension of commerce (Hear). It appeared that in Central South Africa a vast territory existed which was capable of producing every raw material of which this or any other country stood in need. After a few more words he called upon the Lord Bishop of London to move the first resolution.

The Bishop of London, who was received with cheers, then read the following resolution:—"That this meeting, consisting of the merchants, bankers, and others, the citizens of London, hereby present to the Rev. Dr. Livingston their sincere congratulations on the signal care and protection of Divine Providence, vouchsafed to him throughout his prolonged and perilous labours in exploring the interior of South Africa, and the meeting cherishes the gratifying assurance that the important discoveries of Dr. Livingston will tend hereafter greatly to advance the interests of civilisation, knowledge, commerce, and freedom among the numerous tribes and nations of that vast continent" (Applause). It was a great privilege that they should be permitted to meet together, in the centre of the greatest commercial metropolis in the world, to express their thanks to Divine Providence for allowing Dr. Livingston to be brought back in safety from the perils which he had undergone; and the meeting, he trusted, would be permitted to hope that, when he was about to return to that country where his heart was devoted to the service of the Lord, the same Providence would continue to protect him. It was, indeed, most gratifying to meet here to express an opinion in respect to what Dr. Livingston had done. It was most gratifying to hear that confession, the spirit of commercial enterprise, and the missionary cause should go hand in hand; and in the person of Dr. Livingston they had all these three united. There was a lesson for themselves in this great man which probably those who then addressed would not be slow to apply, that they ought never to separate common secular pursuits from those that worked the glory of God. A few years ago it was said that the age of heroism was past; but the time had been given to that by the brilliant instances which had recently occurred; and whilst they celebrated those cases in our own country, it was most elevating to find that in far distant fields, unchecked by applause from men whom they met to honour carried on his heroic enterprise, deserving and commanding the praise of his countrymen more than others to whom they had been ready to award it. (Loud applause.

Mr Raikes Currie, M.P., said he felt it an honour to address the meeting on this occasion, and to second the resolution which had been so ably put by the right rev. Prelate, the Bishop of London. He thought they could not better inaugurate their proceedings than by joining in all heartiness and sincerity in welcoming Dr. Livingston, the apostle of civilisation and Christianity.

Dr. Livingston, who was received with great enthusiasm, here gave a brief account of some of the districts visited by him, confining himself, however, mainly to a geographical description. He stated that he intended to write an account of his travels, to which he referred those present for more minute information. The Zambese river would, he said, form a great highway into Southern Africa. If they entered this river, as they might do, in a steamer at high drought, the country on each side would be found flat, covered with coarse grass and a few coconut and mango trees, forming a delta much larger than Scotland, and intersected with numerous streams. He knew all the country through which Mr. Gordon Cumming and others had hunted, and it produced nothing like the number of elephants which were in the district beyond Tete. Here, too, the country was exceedingly fertile. Unfortunately there had been knife wars in that region, the natives being led into them by people of Portuguese extraction, and they had no mother country to bear the expense, the Portuguese had been rather hotly pressed, and had, in fact, been shut up in their forts at Tete for something like two years. With respect to our own Kaffir wars he did not mean to say much; but they had always wanted a Times commissioner out there, and he believed that if one of those gentlemen had been intrusted with a mission before the last war this country would have saved more than £2,000,000 sterling. These Times commissioners ought to be considered one of our domestic institutions; and if we had a proper transport-service and a Times commissioner at the Cape he believed we should never have another Kaffir war. Dr. Livingston concluded his description by again referring the audience to his promised work for fuller information.

The resolution proposed was then put and unanimously agreed to.

Sir R. Murchison moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting, highly appreciating the intrepidity and perseverance of Dr. Livingston in his extended and dangerous journeys, deems it incumbent to originate a pecuniary tribute as an expression of their admiration and gratitude for his disinterested and self-denying labours in the cause of science and philanthropy." It was impossible that such services as had been performed by Dr. Livingston could have escaped the observation of the Government, and the Earl of Clarendon had taken every opportunity to befriend that gentleman after he knew Dr. Livingston was on the coast of Africa. More than this, he (Sir R. Murchison) was privileged to say that his Lordship was aware of the opinion of some men of science—namely, that a person possessing the powers of the distinguished traveller whom they were now met to honour should be doubly occupied—occupied not only in advancing Christianity through the country he explored, but filling at the same time some public station by which, along our great line of influence, he might prevent the calamities of war, and save both money and life.

The resolution was seconded by Colonel Sykes, and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. J. Dillon moved, and Mr. S. Gurney seconded, the opening of a subscription towards a fund to be called "The Livingston Testimonial Fund." Another resolution proposed by Mr. Sheriff Mechi and seconded by Mr. Alderman Wire, provided for the appointment of a committee.

Mr. Montgomery Martin added some remarks confirmatory of the value of Dr. Livingston's discoveries, founded on some personal acquaintance with the coast of Africa; after which the proceedings terminated.

MANBY TESTIMONIAL.—At a meeting held recently at the Institution of Civil Engineers, the following resolutions were passed:—Resolved unanimously:—"That Mr Charles Manby, who has for upwards of seventeen years held the post of secretary of the Institution of Civil Engineers, having retired from the more active duties of the office, the present is a fitting occasion to acknowledge the important services rendered by Mr. Manby during his tenure of office, as well as his general usefulness to the profession." Resolved:—That the following gentlemen be a committee to carry out the above objects:—The Council of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and Messrs. T. E. Blackwell, T. R. Crampton, W. T. Doyne, G. W. Hemans, J. E. M'Connell, G. Peel, members; and Messrs. J. G. Appold, J. Freeman, John Hamilton, jun., W. Piper, J. Allen Ransome, G. F. White, and T. H. Wyatt, associates, with power to add to their number." At a subsequent meeting of the committee it was resolved: "That the object of the committee being to make the testimonial as general as possible, each subscription be limited to two guineas." Mr. G. P. Bidder has been requested to act as treasurer to the fund, and Mr. James Forrest has been appointed honorary secretary pro tem.

SIR EDMUND FILMER, one of the representatives of the western division of the county of Kent, died at his seat, East Sutton-place, near Maidstone, on Thursday morning, about eight o'clock.

MR. A. W. KINGLAKE, author of "Eothen," is a candidate for Newport, Isle of Wight, in the room of Mr Bagge, resigned.

IMPROVEMENT ON MENTAL CALCULATION.—The two important papers read last session to the Institution of Civil Engineers by Mr. Bidder, upon his process of mental calculation, have, by permission of the council, been reprinted from the Proceedings, under the editorship of Mr. Charles Manby, F.R.S., secretary to the institution: they extend to thirty-two closely-printed pages. An outline of those papers, accompanying the portrait of Mr. Bidder, appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for March 15, 1851.

THE LATE GALES.—The losses at sea have been very great. Between Flamborough Head and the mouth of the Tyne nearly forty vessels have said to be driven on shore, several have been wrecked, and went down with all hands. In the English Channel the weather was equally boisterous. The screw-steamer Dunedin, to Bristol from Lisbon, was lost, near Penzance, with a crew of seven men. The steam-packet Violet, which left Ostend in a fearful storm on Monday night, was wrecked on the Goodwin Sands on Tuesday. Three bodies were picked up, lashed to a life-buoy, and put from the vessel. The Northern Belle, of 1100 tons, from New York to Liverpool, was wrecked, near Kingsgate, on Monday. The Victory, a Margate lugger, which ventured near to render assistance, was struck by a heavy sea, and went down with all hands on board—twelve to fifteen in number. By the heroic efforts of the Broadstairs boatmen the whole of the crew of the American vessel were saved. The Point of Air life-boat was lost off the Welsh coast during the storm, with thirteen hands on board.

Letters from Glasgow mention the failure of Messrs. Begbie, Wiseman, and Co., general merchants and manufacturers, with liabilities to the amount of £150,000, of which nearly £70,000 fall upon houses in Manchester.

THE "SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY" DANCE.

IN this scene the graceful pencil of Mr. Harvey has pictured "that famous country dance" which is called after the great-grandfather of Sir Roger de Coverley, of delightful memory. In these days of revivalism fashion has recalled the celebrated old dance as the joyous conclusion of the ball; though we doubt whether so genial an exuberance of English mirth as this dance admits of had ever been entirely laid aside. It had probably lingered in many an ancestral hall far distant from the great city whither it regain fashion most readily but their way.

We have said that Sir Roger's great-grandfather was the sponsor of the dance; and Mr. W. H. Wills, in his piquant "Notes and Illustrations" to the elegant reprint from the Coverley papers which appeared about five years since, thus pleasantly narrates some further genealogical particulars of the nom de danse, which Mr. Wills prefaces by stating that the real sponsor had only been recently revealed after a vigilant search. He then proceeds:

An autograph account, by Ralph Thoresby, of the family of Calverley of Calverley, in Yorkshire, dated 1717, and which is now in the possession of Sir W. Calverley Trevelyan, states that the tune of "Roger a Calverley" was named after Sir Roger of Calverley, who lived in the time of Richard the First. This knight, according to the custom of that period, kept minstrels, who took the name from their office of "Harper." Their descendants possessed lands in the neighbourhood of Calverley, called Harperfroids and Harper's Spring. "The seal of this Sir Roger, appended to one of his charters, is large, with a chevalier on horseback." The earliest printed copy of the tune which has yet been traced is in "a choice collection to a ground for a treble violin," by J. Playford, 1685. It appears again in 1695 in H. Playford's "Dancing Master." Mr. Chappell, author of the elaborate work on English Melodies, believes it to have been a hornpipe. That it was popular about the Spectator's time is shown from a passage in a satirical history of Powel the Puppet Man, 1715: "Upon the preludes being ended each party fell to bawling and calling for particular tunes. The hobnailed fellows, whose breeches and lungs seemed to be of the same leather, cried out for 'Cheshire Rounds,' 'Roger of Coverley,' 'Joan's Placket,' and 'Northern Nancy.'"

Steele owned that the notion of adapting the name to the good genial old knight originated with Swift.

THE NEW YEAR'S PARTY.

TESTIMONIAL TO M. COSTA.

THIS superb Testimonial was presented by a numerous and influential body of gentlemen, chiefly connected with the management of the Birmingham Musical Festivals, in token of the eminent services of M. Costa as conductor of the musical department of these performances during the last three triennial festivals

At the presentation the Chairman (Lord Willoughby de Broke) stated that, at a time when the duties of M. Costa were extremely onerous, he undertook the production of a new oratorio for the Birmingham Festival; and, notwithstanding his other engagements, in three months it was completed. How well that oratorio succeeded those who heard it would be the best judges. To him it gave perfect satisfaction. M. Costa had conducted the three last festivals in Birmingham; and to his talents, and judgment in conducting, was, in his Lordship's opinion, to be attributed the high reputation and success which they had achieved. After alluding to the gratuitous production of "Eli" for the Birmingham Festival, the Noble Lord concluded, amidst cheers, by presenting the Testimonial.

The Testimonial is of silver, relieved with gold, and the whole of the elaborate details in strict accordance with the recognised authorities on these subjects. It is from the manufactory of Messrs. Elkington, Mason, and Co., and was designed by their principal artist, Mr. Charles Grant. The subject is taken from the first chapter of the First Book of Kings, and represents the presentation in the Temple of the infant Samuel to Eli. The High Priest, robed in gorgeous vestments, and holding a golden censer, occupies a dais in the centre of the group, receiving Samuel at the hands of Hannah, as "dedicated unto the Lord." Opposite to the mother and her first-born is placed Elkanah, leaning in a reverential attitude on his staff, having brought of "the first fruits of the land" as an offering. In the background appear the altar of incense, the table of shewbread, and the pot of manna. The inscription, in raised silver letters, on the front of the pedestal of Sienna marble, is taken from the following passage in the oratorio Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

On a silver plate at the back is engraved:—

TO MICHAEL COSTA, in commemoration of the first performance, on the 26th of August, 1855, of "Eli," an oratorio generously composed by him for the Birmingham Musical Festival, in aid of the funds of the General Hospital, as a tribute to his genius, and as a record of his disinterested liberality, this testimonial is presented by noblemen and gentlemen of the committee of management. MDCCCLV.

TESTIMONIAL PRESENTED TO M. COSTA.

M. Costa, in acknowledging the gift, spoke of his coming to England in 1829, an utter stranger, when Birmingham for a short time became his abode, and here he first experienced kindnesses to which he constantly recurred with pleasurable recollection. Referring to his exertions in connection with the Birmingham Musical Festivals, M. Costa said he felt proud in being at the head of the finest musical corps in the world.

THE CHARLTON CEMETERY.

THE Charlton Cemetery is one of the first of those provided under the new Burial Act, and contains rather more than five acres of land, pleasantly situated on the high-road from Charlton to Woolwich-common. It was purchased by the Burial Board for a considerable sum, on account of its superiority and peculiar advantages as regards contiguity to the parish, fine soil, easy access, &c.

The ground is laid out and planted with trees, shrubs, &c., of a choice description, a portion being set apart for the use of Dissenters, and is inclosed on the front side with a dwarf plinth-wall of red brick and Portland stone in character with the rest of the architecture, and a neat iron palisading on the top. Separate entrances and carriage-gates are provided to the Episcopal and Dissenters' portion of the ground.

The entrance-lodge stands in front, contiguous to the gates, and is a red brick building, with stone dressings, round doors and windows, and an open timber porch. It contains apartments for the porter and a general waiting-room.

The Chapels, which stand on the rising ground, are seen to advantage from the public road. The Episcopal Chapel is a neat structure, in the Early English style of ecclesiastical architecture, and has a western entrance, with a bell-cot at the south-west angle. The interior is planned with stalls, bier, and richly-carved pulpit and desk; the roof is open to the rafters, and stained and varnished. The Dissenters' Chapel is of the same size as the Episcopal, being similarly planned, and fitted with stalls, seats, &c. The roof is of rather simpler character; the style of the building is decorated. The windows are filled with tracery. Both chapels are built of Kentish rag-stone, and Bath-stone dressings to doors, windows, and other parts.

THE CHARLTON CEMETERY.

The contracts of the laying out, building chapels, lodge, entrance-gates, and front wall, amounted to £2615; the whole being carried out under the direction of Mr. S. Hewitt, architect, of Southwark

PROTESTANT CHURCH
LATELY ERECTED AT CANNES.

IN the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for October 25, 1856, in our descriptive Sketch of the charming locality of Cannes, in the south of France, we recorded the gratifying fact of the erection of a Gothic Church for the Protestant population. We now engrave the new edifice, which was designed by Mr. Thomas Smith, architect, of Hertford, and Hart-street, London.

The church is built of the native stone of the district, the mild granite colour of which, contrasted with the Aries stone, of which the mullions, tracery, and dressings are formed, produces a remarkably good effect. The situation is most picturesque, within 400 yards of the Mediterranean, and on the south side of the Nice and Marseilles road

The church is calculated to hold about 200 persons. On the east side of the chancel is a robing-room, corresponding with which, on the west side, is a gallery, intended for the organ, but which has been built at the north end of the nave. The organ front is in perfect character with the church. The style of the edifice is mediæval, of the decorated character; the ceilings are ornamentally groined. The end fronting the road has a handsome four-light window, with a triangular sepulcral in the gable. The sittings, or stalls, are open, and in accordance with the architecture of the building.

The service is that of the English Church, and is performed in the English language.

We take this opportunity of correcting a misstatement which lately appeared in the metropolitan and provincial journals to the effect that Lord Ellenborough, on a recent visit to Cannes, had purchased for the sum of £10,000 the château on the hill, the property of T. R. Woolfield, Esq.; his Lordship having been induced to do so from the fact of its being a facsimile of an old mansion of his ancestors situated on the banks of the Ben Lomond, where he had passed his infancy, and which Mr. Woolfield, having seen and sketched thus reproduced on the shores of the Mediterranean. Mr. Smith, the architect of the church, and also of the château on the hill, from an original design made by him on the occasion of a professional visit paid to Mr. Woolfield in 1850, says no such sketch was submitted to the architect, nor did Mr. Woolfield give him any more definite instruction respecting the character of the building he intended to raise than that he wished it to be in the style of an English castle. The château, we understand, has been purchased by Lord Londesborough.

PROTESTANT CHURCH RECENTLY ERECTED AT CANNES.

Freechurch Manse, Peebles.

IN an article headed "Cannes," which appeared in your Journal on the 25th of October, I observe the following statement:—"The Scotch portion of the community found their consciences would not allow of their listening to the Episcopal service, neither would their pride let them pray in their drawing-rooms, while the other believers had a special edifice. So, accordingly, equal exertions were made on their part. A Scotch church of humble pretensions was erected in the town [illegible], and all were satisfied." As the Presbyterian clergyman who officiated in what is here called the Scotch church, I trust you will permit me to contradict the aspersion thus injuriously cast on those who attended my ministry. The fact is, that the Episcopalians had no "special edifice" at all till some time after that in which we worshipped was erected, and that the latter was erected not by us at all, but by one of their own number—that well-known and truly earnest friend of religious liberty, Admiral Pakenham, who offered us the use of it for the winter at an hour which admitted of our attending the services of both churches on the same day, an opportunity of which not a few of us gladly availed ourselves. I regret that you should have given insertion to a statement so ungenerous and unfair, and so well fitted to awaken illiberal feelings which we Presbyterians found rankling in the bosom of the Episcopalian community when we arrived, and which we used our best endeavours by the blessing of God to allay, and, I rejoice to say, not without success. It is obviously the production of one either in a great measure ignorant of the facts of the case, or wantonly intent on mischief. Hoping that you will not object to give to this rejoinder the same publicity which you have already given to the statement that called it forth,

I am, Sir, &c.,

WM. WALLACE DUNCAN.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE entries for the Chester Cup are rather below Mr. Topham's usual mark; but there is an immense increase in the number of the candidates for the Liverpool Steeplechase. Lambourn, Saunterer, Magnifier, Sprig of Shillelah, and Schiedam, will be put through Mr. Topham's crucible when he adjusts the scale for the former race, and Melissa will, no doubt, have the honour of the top weight. It is rumoured that Blink Bonny is anything but a favourite with the Malton men, on account of her showing a great deal of temper at exercise. Nothing of this kind was observable in public last year, except a suspiciously uneasy way of whisking her tail when she went up to start; and the report must be taken with great reservation. Many go so far as to say that, even with health, she will be at 40 to 1 on the day!

The snow and frost have stopped all hunting since Monday, and the schoolboys, who are guiltless of coursing and fox-cover joys, are having their turn now sledging. There are at present thirty regular visitors in Melton, with about 350 hunters between them; whereas the average number of visitors for some seasons previous had been very little above a dozen. Lord Stamford's one of the most musical packs that ever flew to a scent—had a regular hunter of twenty minutes, from Barkley Holt, on Thursday (Jan. 1)—only four men up when the fox was killed. This over, they had another fifty minutes, not so fast, but a capital hunting run, we believe, from John o' Gaunt's. The new Leicestershire packs are working under a lucky star, as Mr. Tailby has also failed to kill, and that, too, in a country perfectly swarming with foxes. We, however, hear anything but good accounts about the foxes in the Cottesmore country. The Duke of Rutland's hounds have been showing wonderful sport; and cheery Will Goodall seems to be greater than ever both in his kennel management and in the field. Our own hounds have had such a push was never seen in Leicestershire, even in "The Squire's" prime. Everything goes on very comfortably now under Tom Smith's rule in the Brocklesby country, and he bids fair to bring back "Old Will's" days, which are still so affectionately remembered there. His greatest run lately ended without a kill; and it is believed that the fox escaped by climbing into a thorn-tree. A hedger is said to have seen him ascend, but he kept his tongue quiet. This magnanimity rivals that of the clergyman's daughter in Gloucestershire, many years ago, who stole down late at night to a drain from which the hunted fox was to have been dug out next day, and opened the mouth of it. We hear that the Southwold country will be vacant at the close of the season, and that great exertions are making to increase the subscription. Many consider it a better country than either the Brocklesby or Lord Henry Bentinck's, and this year there has been no lack of foxes.

The coursing meetings for next week are—Bradwardine, on Tuesday Whitchurch, on Wednesday; and Altcar Club, on Wednesday and Thursday; and seven lots of greyhounds, some of them of the well-known Motley blood, will come to the hammer, at Aldridge's, on Saturday.

ENGLISH SWINDLERS IN AMERICA.

Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, in his "England and the English," ridicules the rank-and-file-worship which leads our tradesmen and lodging-house-keepers to place the most unbounded confidence in any handsome, well-dressed scoundrel with an aristocratic name or title. Finis Mr. Jones or Smith, though ready to rob, will be viewed with considerable suspicion at first; whereas a ticket-of-leave man who calls himself the Honourable Augustus Frederick Fitzclarence, if he can only dress in character, may run into unlimited credit. Our Transatlantic cousins have a good laugh now and then at this weakness on the part of our countrymen: but they have little cause, for we question whether Jonathan, in spite of all his boast of sharpness, is not quite as easily taken in as John Bull. A very flagrant case of American gullibility, arising from this propensity, was reported in a Pittsburg paper the other day, which a certain Luther Hudson and Sir Charles Miller were the actors, and a considerable number of tradesmen in that city were victimised. The following details of the affair, which we take from the Pittsburg Gazette, will show that there is good scope for clever swindlers in America

"The position of Lord Arthur John Hudson and Sir Charles Miller did not carry them away; and, instead of sporting it at the Monongahela, they contented themselves with the more unpretending quarters of the Mansion House, and procured at the Fulton House, Diamond. This moderation was charming. They were communicative, too; and their admirers were confidently informed that they had always deported with 'a pot of money' on their co-bankers' Drinking, eating, and riding were the order of the day. Money flowed like water; everybody was urged to participate with them in the good things of this life, and everybody accepted the invitation.

"Sir Charles owned a sandbank in Missouri, and such sand for glass making! 'Sir,' said Sir Charles, exhibiting a goblet, 'did you ever see such a bar?' 'my sandbank' 'I made his fortune at once!' 'Lord Arthur admires' 'and must send a few cases' 'and the glass' 'the only good substitute' 'for the magnificent' 'he understood to exhibit' 'early next' 'Lord Arthur' 'and' 'and' 'and SPORTSMEN and GENTLEMEN of the ARMY and NAVY.—S and B. SOLOMONS, Opticians 39, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly. Observe, opposite the York Hotel. Portability, combined with great power in FIELD, RACE-COURSE, OPERA, and general out-door day and night Power-ful Wide-mouthed PERSPECTIVE GLASSES, weighing only four ounces, each containing 12 and 18 lenses, constructed of German glass, will show distinctly a person's countenance at 3 miles. Also, their very large Assortment of Telescopes, and at the Opera-Glass Department, a very choice variety, suitable for all tastes. They are also manufacturers of Surveying, Nautical, and Landscape Telescopes, and can execute any order in a few hours. Their Microscopes are unrivalled for power and simplicity of construction, and are recommended by the Faculty. They become in general use by Gentlemen of the Army and Navy, and by Specimen Gentlemen, Gamekeepers, and Tourists. The most powerful and brilliant Telescopes, possessing such extraordinary power that some, 24 inches, with an extra astronomical eye-piece, will show distinctly Jupiter's moons, Saturn's ring, and the double stars; with the same Telescope can be seen a person's countenance three-and-a-half miles distant, and an object from fourteen to sixteen miles. All the above can be had of larger and smaller powers, with increasing powers, and are sealed by her Majesty's Royal Letters Patent.

EYESIGHT.—Optical Improvements, to enable persons at an advanced age to read with ease, and to discriminate objects with perfect distinctness.—Messrs. SOLOMONS, Opticians, have invented and patented "SELF-ADJUSTING LENSES of the most extraordinary power that ever was produced. The valuable advantage derived from this invention is that, instead of vision becoming strained, fatigued, weakened, and in numerous cases seriously injured, it is preserved and strengthened; and very aged persons are enabled to continue their sight at the most minute occupation; can see with these lenses of a size much less than a sixpence, and read large print at the most frequent changes to the dangerous effects of further powerful assistance. Persons can be suited at once on examining some parts of the world by sending a pair of spectacles, or one of the glasses out of them, in a letter, and stating the distance from the eye they can read small print with, and those who have not made use of spectacles by sending their age.—39, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly (opposite the York Hotel).

THE "CALESSO," OR "CURRICOLO."

THE "CALESSO" OR "CURRICOLO."

(From our own Correspondent.)

AMONGST the most extraordinary spectacles now to be witnessed in Naples is that perhaps of the calesso or curricolo. What a singular carriage it is! The seat is a tripod, resting on a pole with two lofty wheels, which by their rapid movement create a continual cloud of dust. The horse, a wretched-looking animal, is generally full of ardor, and proceeds forward at a rapid pace with the reverse lean, even though the driver as he goes collects his passengers, who thrust themselves in by your side without any ceremony. Perhaps you will complain to coaches, but he has long since given up his seat, and is now standing behind almost concealed by the new faces which one by one have made their appearance. Whilst the front and the back of the carriage have been thus filling, two or three persons will have clambered up and seated themselves at your fest; and even the net which is suspended beneath has reserved its contributions of children and dogs. And now away flies the horse to Pozzuoli or Portici. The driver stands behind, holding in one hand the reins and in the other a whip, which he never ceases to crack. As for the steed he is decked out more gaily than we can describe—the most showy ribbons adorn the mane, and plumes of various colours nod upon his head. He is full of life and spirit, and to look at him with all his splendid trappings galloping along at his utmost speed, you would never dream that he was dragging after him sixteen or seventeen human beings. Quaint and unmodish as the calesso is, we are inclined to think that it was the immediate successor to the biga, not merely in Naples but in Italy generally. This conjecture is supported by the universal sentiment here, as well as by ancient designs and pictures, and, if there be any truth in it, the calesso, in its history, affords another argument to show how, in the progress of improvement, what was admired and used but yesterday is set aside for some new idea of the morrow. So is it by a law of our nature. Away with moralising, however. Besides, who can reflect or reason on the top of a calesso? We are going at the rate of ten miles an hour; our fellow passengers are singing and shouting; our driver is smacking his unwearied whip; and before we can reconcile ourselves to the novel mode of travelling we have arrived at Pozzuoli, minus, it is to be hoped, nothing more than a few grains, the price of our fare.

THE ROYAL BODY-GUARD (HORSE).

In order to become a member of the Royal Body-Guard, a person must have a title of nobility, and deposit 3000 ducats caution money: with a petition, and certain other requisites, after satisfactory information has been obtained, an entrance is ensured. The length of service in this body is six years; after which one obtains his commission, and enters other corps. The duty of these troops is to follow, to accompany, and escort Royal personages when they go out on public ceremonials. Their pay is fifteen ducats a month (equal to £2 16s.)—hardly enough to maintain their horse. Every other expense is defrayed by themselves. There are about 100 persons in this body. We have given two sketches of a soldier of this corps—one in grande tenue (No. 1) the other in undress (No. 2).

No. 1. The helmet is gilt, with tiger's skin, and a black tail. The coat is blue, the ornaments of breast and the epaulets are of silver. Gloves yellow and wristbands white. The pantaloons are of white flannel, and buttons of dress of silver.

No. 2. The coat, as also the pantaloons, are blue—the ornaments of silver. The hat black, with a white feather and red border.

The horsecloth is blue, with silver ornaments and white trimmings. The appearance of this corps is as rich as that of any body of troops we have ever seen.

THE ROYAL BODY-GUARD (FOOT).

This body consists entirely of veteran sergeants, who had obtained their discharge from different branches of the Army, but are still capable of service. Their duty is to stand guard at the gates of the Sovereign and of Royal personages whenever they go anywhere in public form. They assist also at the extraction of the Lottery, which august personage is thus surrounded with the dignity of Royalty. In this body there are about 150 men.

The hat worn by this corps is of black skin, with a white feather, a gilt front plate, and red tassel. The coat is blue, with wristband and collar red; the epaulets and buttons of silver; the pantaloons are of white flannel, and the gaiters are black. Altogether the uniform is one of the richest and in the best taste with which we are acquainted.

THE 13TH REGIMENT OF SWISS

Consists of nearly 2000 men of every nationality except Italian. With no bond of country either amongst themselves or to the service in which they had entered; hired in the streets, and not by virtue of any agreement between Governments, they are truly mercenary soldiers; money is the sole object at which they aim, and money is the only guarantee of their fidelity.

Their chaco is black with a yellow border; button-holes, wristbands, and collars yellow, as are the buttons and epaulets, the pantaloons for summer are white, whilst those for winter are grey; their capote is grey, and sack of white linen.

THE ROYAL BRITISH BANK.

Saturday last being the first day appointed by the Court of Bankruptcy for a division among the creditors of the salvage realised out of the wreck of this unfortunate affair, there was a formidable "rush" of all entitled to participate in it to the head offices in Threadneedle-street, where the following notice was posted up:—

"NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

"Threadneedle-street, Jan. 3, 1857.

"In Bankruptcy.—Re Royal British Bank.

"For the accommodation of creditors, all dividend warrants delivered out by the official assignee in the matter on this Saturday, the 3rd, and on Monday next, the 5th of January, will be paid here until four o'clock on the above days (instead of at 82, Basinghall-street), upon being presented at the counter."

So besieged was the building that the police had to be called in to assist the officers and porters of the bank. It was, however, found difficult to preserve order, in consequence of the presence of a large number of females and others, who, under the influence of exasperated feelings, caused considerable uproar, which was materially augmented by the unobtrusive act of two or three intoxicated creditors, whose conduct compelled those within to close the doors of the bank, and to admit the applicants only by a dozen at a time. This increased the agitation outside, which developed itself in violent declamatory observations on the rascality of the concern, while many gave vent to still more violent demonstrations, by belaboring the brass plates of the "Royal British Bank" with their sticks, umbrellas, and knuckles. Altogether about 2000 creditors out of the entire 6000 were summoned to attend, as far as I can the list. As a matter of course they were true to their appointment, and great blame was freely cast by them on the want of regularity and arrangement that characterised the proceedings. There were present the solicitor of the Bank of England with their "ledgers;" the official assignee in bankruptcy, with his staff of clerks and solicitors; Messrs. Linklater and Hackwood; the clerks and officers of the defunct bank; and the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery. The first dividend of 6d. in the pound was declared in by the official assignee to each of the applicant creditors announced, and the amount was paid upon the spot on its being presented to the Accountant-General. This caused considerable delay and inconvenience—a circumstance that would not have occurred had the cashiers been directed to go and take their warrants immediately to the bank to be cashed. It is supposed that between £100,000 and £300,000 was thus paid over. Considerable confusion, it was stated, was occasioned by some of the dividends being erroneously calculated; many creditors who had proved their debts in Chancery only were highly indignant on being told that, not having proved in bankruptcy, they were not entitled to receive the dividend until they were proved over again in bankruptcy. Another subject of complaint appeared to be that all parties were refused to participate in the dividend who were due for bills discounted on the 1st of September, when the bank stopped payment, although those bills have run off since. One creditor had a certificate of the proof of his debt, with the Commissioner of Bankruptcy's signature, but on pressing it for payment it was refused, although he had a considerable on a great many bills, only one of which now remained. The result will, it is understood, be an application to the Lunacy Court on the subject, the Commissioner having allowed the creditor to set off the amount of this remaining bill, of which he was the drawer.

THE FRENCH PRESS.—M. Neffzer, the able rédacteur en chef of the Presse, avails himself of an attack in the Union upon M. Emile de Girardin to defend his life's work, and at the same time to issue a sort of political manifesto of the course to be adopted by the journal under the new proprietorship. The Union lately said that when M. de Girardin founded the Presse, in 1836, he, for the first time, made a newspaper a commercial speculation (une affaire), instead of an organ of political convictions. To answer to this, M. Neffzer, alluding pleasantly to the small circulation of the Union, says that although it may preach in the desert, its editors certainly do not pretend to be fed by celestial ravens, like the prophet Elias. He contends that the Union was ever a power, although it was always a bad speculation; whereas M. de Girardin has been a constant and obstinate advocate of liberty, while the sympathies of the public have followed the prosperity of his journal. M. Neffzer pledges his honour to preserve M. E. de Girardin's liberal principles as the patrimony of the Presse. He differs from his late master in this, that he cannot admit the utter uselessness of newspapers in France at the present moment. Had he thought so he would have followed M. de Girardin into his retirement. But he thinks that discussion, however fettered it may be, is more useful than silence, and he is resolved to enjoy to the utmost extent such liberty of discussion as the Government will allow him, nothing doubting that the public, as it has hitherto done, will make full allowance for the difficulties by which the profession of a journalist in France is surrounded.—Letter from Paris.

THE METROPOLITAN DRAINAGE.

HOW TO RAISE THE MONEY.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

A DEPUTATION from the Metropolitan Board of Works has waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The prudent reserve of the right honourable Baronet, when directly applied to, to raise the money on the security of the Government and afterwards lend it to the Metropolitan Board of Works to enable them to complete their still-unsettled scheme of drainage; and the admirable and most judicious remarks of some of the newspapers induce me to trouble you with a few thoughts explanatory of a scheme by which the necessary means may be secured for the execution of the work, without pressing on any branch of regular industry. All exceptional or occasional public works requiring the expenditure of any considerable sum of money have the tendency to draw from the usual branches of trade and commerce of a locality or country an amount of money—the vital principle of their existence, and without which they shrivel, dwarf, and die—calculated to derange the ordinary condition of industrial enterprise. This is an acknowledged fact and an admitted evil, whether the expenditure happens to be abroad or at home. If abroad, the evil is prolonged, because the circle to be traversed before the money can return is greatly extended. But even at home, where industry is fostered to the fullest extent, it sometimes happens, as during the railway excitement and subsequent panic, that all the available money of the country is insufficient to pay the wages of the people. Hence the anomaly that what is industrially an indisputable national good may financially become a national disaster. Therefore it is that I venture to propose a plan by which means may be found to thoroughly drain the metropolis without the possibility of any pecuniary inconvenience or difficulty arising during the progress of the works, or from the ultimate redemption of the amount expended.

The present rateable value of property within the area of the metropolitan district is stated by the Chairman of the Board of Works to be £11,150,000. The sum required to complete the projected works, and pay off the scores of the old Commissioners, is estimated at £4,000,000. To repay the principle and interest in fifty years an annual rate of 3½d. in the pound is declared necessary. This rate will produce annually £116,750, which in fifty years will amount to £8,337,500—being considerably more than double the original cost. Should the plan I propose find acceptance, and be adopted, a rate of 2d. in the pound would be ample. This would effect a saving to the ratepayers of 1½d. in the pound—amounting to £74,750 per annum or £3,737,500, in the entire period of fifty years: a sum sufficient to embank the Thames from London-bridge to Westminster, without pressing more heavily on the ratepayers than is now proposed by the Chief of the Board of Works.

I suggest, then, that an account should be opened at the Bank of England called the Metropolitan Board of Works' account. That, as the works proceed, and money must be paid, the Bank of England should, by Act of Parliament, be empowered to issue specific warrants, or certificates of work, of £5 and upwards, to the contractors, with which they should pay for debts incurred, wages, &c. Such warrants should be declared legal tender throughout the metropolitan districts, and be receivable in payment of all local and other rates. Being receivable in payment of the rate on which their validity rested would secure their unchanging value. Their worth being undoubted, they would pass current, and be accepted with all the confidence that appertains to a note of the Bank of England, as will presently be more clearly shown.

The amount of value of rateable property as already named would by a rate of 2d. in the pound produce £92,000. Deducting at the rate of five per cent £4600 a year for collectors' poundage, and £7400 for contingencies, would leave the sum of £80,000 as a balance which in fifty years would cancel the debt of £4,000,000 originally contracted. Or should it be decided that a rate of 4d. in the pound could be levied, and would be paid, the sum would be redeemed in twenty-five years—so that one generation of London would not only see the desirable work accomplished, but all the expenses paid. No depreciation in the warrant could ever take place so long as the rate was levied against which the warrant was issued. The rate and the warrant would by the law that created them expire together.

The remuneration to the Bank of England for the duties it would be called upon to perform would undoubtedly be with that distinguished body a matter of no small importance. I would, therefore, propose to allow it the privilege of superintending the reissue of all surplus warrants received by Government; on which they should be permitted to charge the ordinary rate of interest, as if they were issuing their own notes. Care, however, should be taken that a due and proper account was kept between the Exchequer and the Bank, and the statement of warrants on hand liable to reissue duly announced in the Gazette along with the usual Bank returns.

Permit me to anticipate a few objections that may be urged by money-lenders and professed financiers who follow the beaten track without venturing to inquire whether the usual course is the best that could be adopted, or whether a wiser policy than that which obtains might not be suggested. Some will stigmatise the idea as wild and visionary, and altogether unworthy the attention of a practical people; albeit, their own Government Bonds are often refused by the sages of the City as documents of questionable security seen from their point of view. My answer to such is that the plan has been tried and found eminently successful. Although on a scale considerably smaller it was nevertheless large enough to prove the accuracy of the principle.

Others may hail it as a capital plan to enable them to launch ideal schemes of a speculative nature, having no revenue certain or probable, beyond serial profits culled in the regions of hope. Such schemers must understand that the plan proposed can only be adopted where the revenue is regular and absolutely certain. In the case before us there can be no loss. Properly conducted, anything like failure, or even peril, would be utterly impossible.

A difficulty of weight might arise as to the possibility of keeping such an amount of warrants in circulation and in favour with the public for twenty-five or fifty years; and, should they become tattered through age, how could their substance be renewed? No document will ever suffer the slightest diminution in public favour so long as it pays rates and cancels other obligations. To keep them in circulation, Government should possess the power to reissue such warrants as they might become possessed of (beyond the value of the £80,000 to be cancelled annually), in payment of official salaries, Government employés and contractors, dockyard and other public functionaries engaged within the metropolitan district. As the warrants would, doubtless, be worked severely, and made to move from hand to hand quickly, to ensure their decent appearance and constant renewal,—no warrant should be issued a second time. But it should never be split up, altered in value, or have its original number changed. Over or preceding the original number should be placed a serial letter denoting the number of times it had been renewed, such marks to be known only in the registrar's office of the Bank of England. These, however, are merely matters of detail which experienced officials in the Bank could promptly arrange, so as to secure safe, efficient, and regular working. The one principle on which my scheme is based is that, instead of depositing Exchequer Bills, or other warrants bearing interest, and receiving in return other warrants bearing no interest, it would be wiser to make the original bills or warrants circulate as money, under such restraints and in such amounts as might be deemed necessary for the protection and convenience of the public.

Another doubt may be suggested. Could the trade and general business of the entire metropolitan district float in daily use so large an addition to the notes and cheques now circulating? In answer "Yes!" because the warrants would not supersede any instrument, principle, or practice now in use, but in all cases assist in performing the work hitherto confined to Bank of England notes and cheques. Should it be found profitable, some of the Bank of England notes might, like favourite actors, perform a provincial tour, and gladden many hearts, and afterwards be received with undiminished honour by their friends in town. As regards cheques no anxiety need exist. If merchants found it more convenient to pay the warrants than to draw cheques, they would, and, if they did not, they would not.

Such are a few of the obvious objections I have endeavoured to answer, and such is the scheme I throw down to be taken up and welcomed, or tossed about and worried, according to the disposition, judgment, or self-interest of the persons undertaking to discuss the question. That the plan is faultless I do not pretend to assert, but I am persuaded that such faults could easily be remedied, if honestly undertaken. That it would work I have every confidence. That the warrants would be negotiable I have not the slightest doubt. That they would be as little liable to forgery as any other document circulating as money I am equally certain. Above all, when proved—as I feel confident it would be—a great success, it would render possible many things looked upon as impossible and improbable. Some questions might be solved by two or three years' experience from which men of genius have turned in despair. We might probably discover some principles well worthy the adoption of the nation, having the well-being of the entire people, and not alone the advantage of the metropolitan section—though a most important section—at heart. At all events it would be demonstrated how all the various public improvements suggested might be accomplished: giving breadth to the streets and convenience to the traffic, necessitated by the growth of the population and the proportionate increase of the commercial transactions of London.

Trusting you will find space for these remarks—all I desire being a full and fair discussion—and apologising for the length to which they have been extended, I remain, your obedient servant,

City, 3rd Jan., 1857. B.

P.S.—Though I suggest a plan for raising the means, I beg most emphatically to dissent from the plan of drainage said to be adopted.

WANT OF GOOD HOUSEWIVES IN AMERICA.—We have seldom initiated a more wholesome agitation than by a recent article on the average food of our countrymen, or rather their average cookery. The multiplicity of the letters drawn out by that article shows that we have touched a tender spot. We shall not repeat the operation from time to time, and hope thus to be instrumental in working a great and much-needed reform. It would be provoking, if it were not amusing, to note how much ingenuity is shown in perverting what we said. Thus one lady writes boastingly of her milk, butter, fresh vegetables, fresh eggs, fine fruits, pure water, and wonders how we can pretend that city living is equally good. Why, madam, we never thought of such a thing. You in the country have comparably the best materials from which to prepare food—nobody ever doubted that; but it is the manner you make of those materials that we criticised. Your table may be a model of good judgment and good cookery; we know those that are. but this is by no means the general rule. On the contrary, we know some of the finest fruit sections in our country in which fruit can be offered in particle of fruit with breakfast or dinner for at least nine months in each year, while poor bread, pie-crust, or muddy preparation that they call coffee are the staple of breakfast; and the same for the coffee and also a lot of watery potatoes, are the substance of most dinners. Should not this be remedied, to work sundry artists in embroidery or otherwise, which we could not safely name and would prefer not to judge, and to imagine they know something of the oligries; but their education for the management and oversight of a household is sadly neglected. It is rather hard that a young mechanic, with no fortune but his hands, having just married a wife, should be compelled the next month to hire an Irish girl to cook his dinners; but that is often the case. Let a family in the country be visited by sickness, so as absolutely to need foreign help, and if there be not an Irish colony within easy reach they must suffer; for the great mass of our farmers' daughters are too proud, too ignorant, or too indolent, to do housework, even for good pay. These be deplorable truths; it was not so in the days of our grandmothers, and it must be odious even in the days of our children. We might proceed with comments on the mis-appreh nsions and blunders of our indignant culinary correspondents; but we will let their productions speak as critiques on such unique dishes for all breakfast-tables. Those who are growing up to be farmers' and mechanics' wives ought to think and study more, and practise more with reference to their prospective household duties, even though their daughters should learn their piano lessons and stay away from the dancing-school to that end. There may be sober truths, and the best housewives know it. New York Tribune.

A NOVEL WAR.—We learn from the last batch of papers forwarded to us by our Calcutta correspondent that another Indian war is on the eve of breaking out. Indian warfare has been of such frequent occurrence since the British got footing in the great Asiatic peninsula that this latest announcement is not, of course, much surprise our readers. But the war which is now impending there is of an extraordinary and unique character, and different in every respect from all that ever went before it. It is not against a Hyder Ali or a Tippoo Saib. It is not against the fanatical Sikhs of the heroic Affghans—that this war is to be waged. The enemy with which the British will now have to contend is of a more savage and sanguinary nature than even they; and the accounts of him which we glean from our Indian papers recall to our memory those half-discredited stories that Herodotus tells us about the terrific monsters which spread dismay among the Indian communities of Hellas in the mythical ages. The war, in fact, which the British are now about to wage in India will be a war against tigers, not men. It is with the quadruped, not the biped, of the jungle that the masters of that great country will now have to do battle. Nor will this war be offensive on their part, but purely defensive. The enemy has been in the present instance the aggressor. He has rushed out of his jungles and fastnesses, and devastated their territory, and put their people to flight, so that the land is now a wilderness, and its inhabitants too poor to pay the accustomed tribute. In a word, an army of tigers has invaded a district of the Nerbuddah territory, driven away its occupiers, taken possession of their property, and left the Anglo-Indian Government minus a revenue amounting annually to six and fifty thousand rupees. The journals do not say what warrior is to command the Volunteer Corps; but doubtless some chief high in reputation among the Indian Generals will receive the appointment. Whether the felines will be able to hold their own against the force which is about to be sent against them we shall not venture to predict; but even the Britishers, who are apt to underrate the prowess and strength of their foes, admit that it will take at least two sanguinary campaigns to extirpate and overcome tigerdom. In due season we shall of course be apprised of the result. New York Times.

SPIRITUALISM.—The spiritualists of New York have resolved themselves into two factions the "Christians" and the "Non-Christians"—the former acknowledging the divinity of the Saviour. These have established a separate church. The congregations number several hundred each.

MEDAL FOR ARCTIC DISCOVERIES.

THE medal which the Queen, without solicitation of any kind, has been graciously pleased to bestow on those who were engaged in the Arctic discoveries from 1818 to 1855, although in size the same as the war medals, is strikingly distinguished by the peculiarity of its form, which is octagonal. This occasions a loss of surface around the bust, and somewhat impairs the breadth of its effect, but the fault is amply compensated by the design and execution of the bust itself, in which are combined the placid dignity of habitual command, and the life-like expression of thoughtful, matronly, grace. The hair is very tastefully arranged, and bound with a javelled fillet, and on the brow is a tiara, edged with pearls, which being placed on a line with the forehead, adds intellectuality to the countenance. This portrait is more particularly interesting from its resemblance to her Majesty as she appears at this day. The likeness on the war medals being from the die engraved by the late William Wyon, R.A., at an early period of her reign. The present bust is the first medal-portrait of the Queen which has been executed since the death of that distinguished artist, and proves that his mantle has worthily descended to his son. In common with the war medals it is inscribed simply "Victoria Regina," which we take leave to think is a mistake. Where sovereign power is expressed, the derivation and extent of that power may without ostentation be clearly defined; and we should have prefarred seeing her Majesty's titles in full, and these too in a language which the recipients speak and understand. Is there anything discreditable or deficient in the English tongue that, on occasions like the present, its living energy should be relegated for a stiffened mummy embalmed nearly 2000 years? Which war cry, amid the horrors of Alma and Inkerman, would best have steeled the arm and nerved the heart of her gallant soldiers, "Hurrah for the Queen!" or "Vivat Regina!"? The Latin would have fallen flat as a dead shell in a quagmire; while the native household words would have sent a flush of blood from heart to brow, and for a moment made a hero of the lowest in the ranks. Why, in the name of common sense, then, should her Majesty's approbation of their services be lessened by an inscription which is probably unintelligible to three out of every four of those on whom it is conferred?

The reverse of the Arctic medal presents us with a northern scene. In the distance is an exploring ship laid up in the sea between two icebergs, dismantled and roofed in for the winter. In front, on shore, is a sledging party setting off for inland exploration. The whole is very ably engraved, and tells all that such a scene admits. Inscribed, "For Arctic Discoveries," "1818-1855." Obverse and reverse engraved by Leonard Charles Wyon, of H.M. Mint.

In our next we shall engrave the war medal for her Majesty's fleets in the Baltic, 1854-55, the work of the same artist.

INEDITED LETTER OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The following inedited letter of Sir Walter Scott was addressed to the late Mr. Samuel Parker, in answer to a written request from that gentleman that Sir Walter would furnish a subject for the reverse of the large medal of George IV. The Royal medal, together with one commemerative of Scott's literary services, accompanied Mr. Parker's letter:

"SIR,—I would long ere now have answered your very obliging letter with the medals. That representing our Sovereign seems most beautifully executed, and is a striking resemblance. I have very little turn for suggesting mottoes. I once read the classical work which you name in the great storehouse of such things. I incline to think that a figure or head of Neptune upon the reverse, with the motto round the exergue, 'Tridens Neptuni Sceptrum Muudi,' would be better than any motto more personally addressed to the King himself, than to his high kingly office. I cannot, of course, be a judge of the other medal; but such of my family as are with me, think it is very like. If there is any motto to be added, I should like the line—' Bardorum Citharas Patrio qui reddidit Istro,' because I am far more vain of having been able to fix some share of public attention upon the ancient poetry and manners of my country, than of any original effort which I have been able to make in literature. I beg you will excuse the delay which has taken place; your obliging communicanon with the packet which accompanied it, travelled from country to town, and from town to country, as it chanced to miss me upon the road.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your obliged, humble servant,

Edinburgh, May 29th [no year]. WALTER SCOTT.

NOTES.

OLD SIGNS IN LONDON.—Until lately there was a remarkably fine old sign to be seen upon a house in Clement's-lane, Lombard-street, built soon after the Fire of 1666, and called the Three Foxes. These animals were carved in relief, on stone, sitting in a row, with the date beneath of (I think) 1670. Within the last few months the house was taken for occupation by an eminent firm in the legal profession, requiring more room, who, probably ignorant of its value, had the sign would have too much the appearance of a standing joke, had the surface of the stone filled up and rendered smooth with Roman cement.—L. A. B. W.

SHAKSPEARE AND BACON.—I won't have Bacon. I will have my own cherished "Will." I have borne a great deal, and never changed my faith. I have seen him chipped, mauled, befribbled and overdone. I have seen upholsterers and classic managers cloud his glories in fustian and explanations. I have heard shouts against his anachronisms, and anathemas against his want of the unities and ignorance of Greek; but never thought that an Englishman, and a "Smith," would try to prove that he was a swindler—a thief—a jackdaw—and died, in the odour of sanctity, the pilferer of Bacon. Have we no literary police—no pen jealous of the honour of our "immortal bard"? Oh, for an hour with the giant Christopher North! Oh, for some swashing blows of his rhetorical cudgel to crush this fungus! I know the pestilent vapour will pass away, and the steady glories of Will. Shakspeare blaze forth again, but in the mean time we shiver under the passing cloud. First, a College of Monks wrote Shikspur; now it's the jurisprudist Bacon. Way not Sir Walter Raleigh? Why not Queen Elizabeth herself? But, as I began, we won't have "Bacon!"—JOHN BULL.

ANOTHER SHAKSPEARIAN DISCOVERY.—The interest excited by the "find" of a second copy of the quarto "Hamlet," 1603, has hardly subsided, when we hear that Mr Staunton has succeeded in discovering the Ashtest of more than one copy of an edition of this play, that of 1604, considered of equal rarity with the far-famed quarto of 1603. The "Hamlet" of 1604, which, in the titlepage, is described as "Newly imprinted and enlarged to almost as much againe as it was, according to the true and perfect Copie," was printed by Jaggard, and is mentioned by Malone, Steevens, and Halliwell, but no copy is to be found either in the Capell collection, at Cambridge, or in that of Malone, at Oxford.

WHERE DOES DAY BEGIN?—It is a fact well known that ships circumnavigating the globe from east to west lose a day in the voyage, but has it ever been noticed where the day begins? is first noticed? W. SYMONS.

[The inquiry of W. S. originates in a mistake. The day necessarily begins in every part of the world with daylight as distinguished from night; both constitute a nychthemeron, or day of twenty-four hours. Some reckon the day from noon, others from midnight, whilst the most ancient practice was to compute from sunrise to sunset. The navigator who proceeds from east to west, returning to the same point, loses a day in reckoning, as compared with the person who is stationary, because the navigator has overtaken the sun in one revolution of the globe. Supposing, on the other hand, that he circumnavigate from west to east, he gains a day, making one more day than the man who is stationary, because he has one sunset or sunrise additional.]

THE POPE'S TRIPLE CROWN.—What are the kingdoms on account of which the Pope is said to wear a triple crown?

[The Tiara, or triple crown, is called regnum, and is used by the Pope in going to and returning from church, in which place he assumes the mitre ("Sacrarum Cerimoniarum Sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ," III., iii., § 5, c. 9). Boniface VIII. (1294—1303) was the first who adorned his diadem with a second crown, in sign of temporal and spiritual dominion. Urban V. (1362—1389) designed the Triregnum—a symbol, perhaps, of the mystic number, according to Tosi ("Corte di Roma," p. 95). See Dr. Wordsworth's "Apocalypse," App. LI., p. 163. The work of Tosi was approved by the Maestro del Jagro Palazzo, 5th of August, 1764; so that we cannot ascend to a higher official authority. It is to be borne in mind, however, that the Pope affects to be a mystery; and there wants a rationale to convert a temporal symbol of power into a spiritual symbol of the Divine Trinity. A more probable solution is that Boniface VIII. assumed the second crown in opposition to the claim of Austria, as King of the Romans; and that Urban V., a Frenchman, having taken up his residence at Avignon, leaving the Legate Albornes to defend the temporal interests of the Roman See in Italy, intended to show, by assuming a third crown, his temporal authority in France. If so, Napoleon III. may do well to reduce the Papal crowns to Boniface's number, and arrange with Austria for divesting him of his second crown as King of the Romans (Sismondi. Rep. Ital., c. xxiv., p. 136, c. xlviii., p. 2).]

THE TOWN PRIEST.—The following hexameters may be seen in black letter over an ancient doorway in Northgate-street in this city:

En ruinosa domus quondam quam tunc renovavit
Magnus urbanus Osborne Join rite vocatus.

In the "Merry Wives of Windsor," act ii., scene 1, occurs this passage, "I will not believe such a Cataian, though the priest o' the town commended him for a true man." Doubtless some gentle, and at the same time antiquarian, reader can give information as to the office and status of this functionary whose name is to be identical in the legend and in the play?—A. J. WOOD, Gloucester.

ANSWERS.

THE THREE CROCKS OF GOLD.—The origin of this legend is purely Eastern. It is given by Mr. Lane in his "Arabian Tales and Anecdotes," a collection interesting alike to the Oriental student and to the general reader, though I have not noticed any notice of such kind of version of it in other and even more venerable, Oriental literature. That it is Eastern, however, there can be no doubt, and may have come to us, like the great mass of the traditionary lore of the Western World, from ancient India—the fountain head (as it seems to me) not only of the mythologies and philosophies, but of the very traditions and folk-lore of the human race. I take the liberty of transcribing the Arabian legend as rendered by Mr. Lane:—

It is related that a man of Baghdad was possessed of large riches and great wealth; but his wealth passed away and his state changed, and he became utterly destitute, and could not obtain his sustenance save by laborious exertion; and he slept one night, overwhelmed and oppressed, and saw in his sleep a person who said to him, "Verily, thy fortune is in Cairo; therefore seek it and repair to it." So he journeyed to Cairo; and when he arrived there the evening overtook him, and he slept in a mosque. Now there was adjacent to the mosque a house, and as God (whose name be exalted!) had decreed a party of robbers entered the mosque, and thence passed to that house; and the people of the house, awakening at the disturbance occasioned by the robbers, raised cries, whereupon the Wales (magistrate, came to their aid with his followers, and the robbers fled. The Wales then entered the mosque, and found the man of Baghdad sleeping there; so he laid hold of him and inflicted upon him a painful beating with the mikrabis until he was at the point of death, and imprisoned him, a subject for the severest pain. On the morrow, after which the Wales caused him to be brought, and said to him, "From what country art thou?" He answered, "From Baghdad." "And what affair," said the Wales, "was the cause of thy coming to Cairo?" He answered, "I saw in my sleep a person who said to me, 'Verily, thy fortune is in Cairo; therefore repair to it.' And when I came to Cairo I found the fortune, of which he told me, to be those blows of the mikrahs that I have received from thee. And upon this the Wales laughed so that his grinders appeared, and said to him, "O thou of little sense, I saw three times in my sleep a person who said to me, 'Verily, a house in Baghdad, in such a district, and of such a description, hath in its court a garden, at the lower end of which is a fountain, wherein is wealth of great amount; therefore repair to it and take it.' But I went not; and thou, through the smallness of thy sense, has journeyed from city to city on account of a thing thou hast seen in sleep, when it was only an effect of confused dreams." Then he gave him some money, saying to him, "Help thyself with this to return to thy city." So he took it and returned to Baghdad. Now the house which the Wales had described, in Baghdad, was the house of that man; therefore, when he arrived at his abode, he dug beneath the fountain and beheld abundant wealth. Thus God enriched and sustained him, and this was a wonderful coincidence."

RAPIN DE THOYRAS.—In the different biographical notices of Paul de Rapin which I have seen no reference is made to his having been taken prisoner in Ireland. It is well known that he was so severely wounded in the assault on Limerick, in 1690, that he could not accompany his General into Flanders, but had to be left in Ireland. It is not possible that he, with other wounded, may have been removed for security to the fort in Donegal referred to by your correspondent "R. D. W.," supposing such to have been in the hands of William? That any part of his "History of England" was written whilst there is highly improbable, as he is stated only to have commenced it at Wesel, about 1707, having finally left Ireland in 1693. Rapin resigned the command of his company in favour of his brother, who had served with him in Ireland, and who died a Lieut.-Colonel of Dragoons, in 1719.—THE GREAT-GREAT-GREAT-GRANDSON OF THE HISTORIAN.

ADMIRAL BYNG'S DEATH-WARRANT.—Notwithstanding that the twelve Judges to whom the sentence of death on Admiral Byng was referred for their opinion as to its legality declared it to be valid, and in every respect in order; Admiral John Forbes, then one of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, refused to sign the warrant for carrying out the sentence, and prepared a paper in which he assigned his reasons for his refusal. The document in possession of your correspondent may be a rough draught or even a copy in the Admiral's handwriting. The original, I believe, to be in the Admiralty-office at Whitehall, and is dated 16th Feb., 1757.—A NAVAL OFFICER, Island of Serpents, Black Sea.

CURIOUS DEMAND—SMOKE FARTHINGS.—These smoke farthings which so puzzle X Y Z., were originally a certain impost levied by the clergy upon every person who kept a fire. The "hearth money," which was a similar tax, and extremely unpopular, was paid to the King. This latter impost was first levied in 1653, and its last collection was in 1689.—J. BUTTERWORTH

PERSEPOLIS.

THE readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will remember that in 1843 the French Government sent an Embassy to Persia. M. Eugene Flandin, who was attached to the Embassy as artist, has become not only an artist but an historian, having written a very successful journal of the Expedition, "Travels in Persia." No man, perhaps, is better able to give us an insight into the present state of Persia than M. Flandin, who lived for some years in close intimacy with the Shah. We have selected from his numerous and valuable Illustrations of the antiquities and scenery of the country, the four accompanying views.

THE RUINS OF PERSEPOLIS, OR THE ROYAL CITY.

This name was formerly given to the whole capital of ancient Persia, but it is now confined to the group of ruins that represents the ancient palace of the Kings of Persia. The name now applied to that locality is Takht-i-Djemhid (the throne of Djemhid). It is also called Thehel Sutoun (the forty columns), but the number is strictly arbitrary. The huge gates thrown open and looking upon the desert, the lofty columns deprived of their capitals, the Royal halls whose only guests are the figures carved upon the walls, some maimed caryatides, are all that remain of the ancient city of Darius and Alexander.

THE SEPULCHRAL CAVES, &c.

The Persian dynasties covered all parts of their vast territory

[illegible] representations of their exploits. They chose the mountains for their record office, and the rocks for their books, upon which with the chisel had been written in bas-relief the history of the empire. These hard books, if such they may be called, have happily escaped the destructive fire of the Arabs. They were unable to remove these mountains, and it is to this circumstance that we are in part indebted for the sculptures: amongst others we may mention the representation of the hunting of the stag and the wild boar at Jaghi-Bestan, and the meeting of the Emperor Aurelian with Chapour, his conqueror in the battle that bears the name of this King. At Persepolis, too, we see in a number of historical rocks a representation of the fatal night, when Alexander, intoxicated with love and wine, made of Persepolis a torch to light his orgies. This act, which somewhat tarnished his glory, has been of great service to the arts, for we owe to him the conservation of the rest of this monumental city. These ruins, uninhabited and uninhabitable, have been preserved to the fury of the Arabs, and they owe their safety to their barrenness, while Darius, their master, derives his celebrity, from his defeat.

THE GRAND MOSQUE AT ISPAHAN.

Ispahan is, no doubt, the largest city in the world, and the Persians have given to it the popular title of the half of the world. The most important monuments of Ispahan are the Mosques, which were commenced in the reign of Haroun-el-Redchid, who reigned at Bagdad in the thirteenth century. The handsomest of these buildings is situated in the "Place Royale." In front is a court in the regular form of a half pentagon. On one side of the court is an elegant gate of cypress-wood, supported by two minarets, which leads into the interior of the temple. In the centre of this interior court is a large basin, where the ablutions are made; and around are the school-rooms where the Mollahs teach their disciples. On another side is the sanctuary at the bottom of which is seen the Mehrab, to which the Mahometans turn their heads when they pray. The Persians are indebted for this mosque to Shah Abbas, who expended nearly £1,000,000 sterling in building it—an enormous sum where the labour is paid at so low a rate as in Persia.

PERSIAN DIVAN.

The next Sketch which we present to our readers is that of the andéroum, where the Persian gentleman receives his guests and it may not be uninteresting to our readers to describe the peculiar pointed cap which he will see upon the heads of the Persian gentry. The cap is made of lamb's wool, the bottom descending down to the neck and the top inclining to a point. This coula, as it is called, is exactly the same shape for all classes, but it varies in price, according to the quality of the wool, and by the quality of the cap the Persian will discover the rank of a person. To give the reader an idea of the value we may mention that they may be obtained at prices ranging from five or six sabertas (five or six shillings) to ten or eleven tomauns (six or seven pounds). It is only since the establishment upon the throne of the Kadjars dynasty that the Persians have substituted the black pointed cap for the turban. The Mollahs and the Seids are now the only persons who wear the turban—the former white, and the latter of a blue or green colour.

Having already spoken of ancient Persia and its monuments, we will now say a word or two about the present Shah of Persia.

The Shah of Persia is a great patron of art, and owing to this circumstance Eugene Flandin has had the privilege of many private interviews with him. One day, when crossing the garden of the palace, the Shah who was standing at a window, asked him if he had brought any drawings. M. Flandin produced his portfolio (which had been carried for him by an officer of the palace). The Shah beckoned a master of the ceremonies, who immediately introduced M. Flandin to the private apartments of the Shah, who was there waiting for him.

"After leaving my babouches at the foot of the private staircase (says M. Flandin), I ascended to the private apartments of the Shah; there I found his Majesty sitting on the ground, according to the Oriental fashion, and reclining against one of the walls of the apartment.

"In front of him, at a short distance, there were two columns of alabaster beyond which the master of the ceremonies dared not go: he stopped at the columns and introduced me to the Shah, who graciously requested me to come close to him and show my drawings; he was very much interested in them all, and asked many questions concerning them, but he paid particular attention to all the sketches having any reference to military matters.

"Having taken sketches from every department of the army, I was enabled to produce before him drawings of the various costumes of the artillery, cavalry, infantry, and commissariat, and also sketches of guns, gun-carriages, and of his own patent gun-carriage: he asked many questions concerning the equipments of European armies, and evinced great knowledge of what was going on in Europe; he even descended to minute details, and asked many questions about helmets, cuirasses, belts, swords, boots, and spurs, and also was inquisitive about horses, saddles, bits, and bridles.

"Having my drawings spread out before him, he then compared the equipment of his own army with those of Europe, and after an interview of more than two hours' duration he dismissed me with many thanks, and requested me to forward to him copies of all my drawings, which I have subsequently done. Next day I left for Europe, greatly pleased with all I had seen and accomplished in Persia."

A CHILD AT PLAY. Song, written by J. G. LYONS, LL.D.—CANCONETTA. Pour le Piano.—DEUX PARAPHRASES FUGITIVES. Pour le Piano.—A STAR. Ballad, written by G. Gerard, Esq.—Sutton and Potter, Dover.

These numerous compositions have appeared through the medium of various publishers, almost simultaneously, or, at least, within a recent period. The name of M. Schulthes was previously unknown to us; and we presume that he is a young man recently come to England. We have examined all these pieces very carefully, and find that they well deserve the attention of the public, the composer being evidently an artist of uncommon genius and attainments. Not that they have given us unmingled satisfaction; they are very unequal in merit: some may be regarded as gems, particularly the "Deux Paraphrases Fugitives," and the "Canconetta," which are clear, simple, and full of charming melody. But most of the other pianoforte pieces—though none of them are without beauties—are more or less deformed by the mannerisms and affectations of the modern German school, into which a young votary of that school is naturally apt to fall, but which time and experience, when he has true artistic feeling, will enable him to shake off. Mr. Schulthes is too fond of extreme keys, abrupt and startling modulations, enharmonic transitions, sky-rocket flights of execution, and notes split into strings of demisemiquavers and double demisemiquavers to show off the lightness of the performer's fingers. These things will be found most abundantly in the "Romance muy Dolorosa;" the "Schneeperlen," or "Neige des Perles," (a title borrowed from Osborne's popular "Pluie des Perles;") and the "Transcription Fantastique," or variations on a German air. We never hear such music without thinking of the advices to composers given by the illustrious Piccini. "To modulate," he said, "is not difficult in itself; there is a routine for that as for other mechanical arts. This is proved by those enharmonic modulations which to the ignorant appear the height of science, but are really the sport of scholars. To create melody from a given modulation, to quit it only by the proper means, to return to it without harshness or insipidity, to make the change of modulation a just means of expression and of judicious variety—these are the real difficulties of the art. But to quit a key almost as soon as we have entered it, to be extravagant without reason or object, to proceed by skips and jumps merely for the sake of change; in short, to modulate for the sake of modulating, shows that the artist is ignorant of the principles and end of his art, and affects a superabundance of fancy and imagination, in order to conceal the want of both the one and the other." Every composer should lay these admirable observations to heart; there are few composers of our day who would not profit by them.

M. Schulthe's vocal pieces are among the best specimens of the modern German style of song writing that we have lately met with. Almost the only fault with which they can be charged is one very excusable in a foreigner,—misplacing the accents of his English words, and placing his emphatic note on a mere conjunction or particle. Thus, we have "She walks in beauty," "Dreaming of structures tall and fair," &c. One of them—"A Star"—is free even from this fault, and is a perfect English ballad. Byron's poem, "She walks in beauty," is very beautifully set, having the unmeaning enharmonic transition grammitously introduced.

On the whole we attach much value to these compositions, not only as possessing many beauties, but as giving earnest of future efforts still more successful.

PART VIII. OF POPULAR MUSIC OF THE OLDEN TIME. A Collection of Ancient English Songs and Ballads. By W. CHAPPELL, F.S.A. Harmonised by G. A. MACFARREN.

The present number brings this interesting work to the close of its first volume, with the completion of the reigns of James and Charles I. As might be expected the tunes become more numerous in each successive period; and, although there are many of great beauty among the earliest, their average merit certainly increases with the advance of the time. "Thomas, you cannot," with which this part opens, is one of very quaint and striking humour. "When Daphne did from Phœbus fly," is a pretty ballad on the mythological story of Daphne turned into a bay tree never before reprinted, and with a graceful and plaintively expressive tune. "O come you from Newcastle" is a singularly beautiful melody, stamped with nationality, and of such excellence as must be universally appreciated. "The Noble Shirre" is a characteristic old strain, with a burden to which, with all his researches, Mr. Chappell has not been able to trace the original words. This may be a matter of regret to the antiquary since the ballad, whatever it may be, would probably afford some interesting illustration of the unusual contraction of the title of county dignity "Shire Reeve" or "Sheriff," and would appear to be of very early date. "The buff-coat has no fellow" is an excellent example of the rough and jovial character of the cavalier soldier—bold, energetic, and animated. "A Hunting we will go," illustrates another phase of the English character which has much declined, and may soon fade away, as so many have already; possibly to the improvement of our intellectual faculties but, as tending to our nationality, it is nevertheless matter of regret. The famous old ballad of "King John and the Abbot of Canterbury," the legend of which reappears in Bürger's popular poem "Der Kaiser und der Abt," is to be traced from country to country, from tradition to tradition, until it loses itself like the mighty water, in which stood the rock, on which rested the tortoise, on which stood the elephant that bore the world we inhabit. In the impenetrable mystery of Oriental origin this famous ballad, with its tune, and with the more modern version of the same, under the name of "A Cobbler there was, who lived in a stall," will interest everybody. Two eminently characteristic tunes to the homely ditty of "Tom Tinker's my true love, and I am his dear," are indigenously English, but of another stamp. Sir John Suckling's exquisite ballad "I'll tell thee, Dick," describing a wedding at Charing-cross, which has been incessantly quoted, and will be as ceaselessly admired, receives no little additional interest from being presented to us with its original tune; and its speedy popularity is proved by the satires on Sir John's troop of horse, (that ran away in the Civil Wars) being sung to the same air. "Cupid's Courtesy" is a charming melody, and "Remember, O thou man," a good old characteristic Christmas carol. It is curious to discover here, under the name of "The Country Lass," the tune now known as "Sally in our Ally," and which is certainly not the one that Carey himself wrote to his popular relation of the apprentice's love; but, meritorious as that is, this has entirely superseded it in association with Carey's words, and our surprise is, as it will probably be of many others, that it should pertain to a ballad written by Martin Parker, the most fameus ballad-writer of the reigns of James and Charles I. "Fair Margaret and Sweet William," or Margaret's Ghost," closes the volume, and it is scarcely surpassed by any in the collection for melodious fluency and pathetic expression.

These tunes we have cited as the most conspicuous, and many others of merit only inferior to these, and of which the historical interest is in some instances even greater, make up the number before us, and tend fully to confirm the proposition which Mr. Chappell's work is designed to prove, namely—that the English are intrinsically a music-making and a music-enjoying people; that with them have originated many of the best national tunes the world has ever had; and that the times have been when they as a mass have heartily relished to sing and to listen to them. Possibly, if these truly national songs could resume their popularity, and become again familiar to everybody's ears and fingers, they might regenerate the love of what is English because it is English, that so strongly characterised our ancestors, and displace the sickly distaste for home produce that is the stigma upon modern times. If so, futurity will owe a national debt to the industrious editor who has brought all these interesting relics to light; if not, we shall still have to thank him for having made us acquainted with an immense accumulation of charming tunes, which, whether as old or new, as English or exotic, no one can hear without delight.

The airs are simply ye, beautifully arranged by Mr. Macfarren.

THE FLEMING TESTIMONIAL.

THIS elegant piece of plate has been presented to the Rev. Francis Fleming, M.A., F. R. G. S., late Military Chaplain of Kaffraria, Cape of Good Hope, by the inhabitants of King William's Town, on the occasion of his leaving South Africa.

Mr. Fleming was Chaplain at King William's Town for several years, and during the late Kaffir war. Whilst there, in addition to his military duties, he was enabled to minister to the wants of the inhabitants of the town and district generally, and was mainly instrumental in assisting to erect in that place the first church in Kaffirland; besides forming schools and carrying out other objects beneficial to the community. He is also the author of two works descriptive of Kaffraria and Southern Africa.

At the expiration of the war, having been removed to Mauritius, he was, on the occasion of his departure, presented with an address, signed by the inhabitants of Kaffraria, including those of all religious denominations: and to this mark of their esteem and respect has been added the piece of plate in our Engraving.

The Testimonial is a silver epergne: the three figures, emblematical of Faith, Hope, and Charity, stand on a triangular pedestal, and group around an oak-tree; the branches of which, whilst shading them, support a bowl of African flowers. On the sides of the pedestal are engraved Mr. Fleming's armorial bearings, crest and initials, together with the inscription. The design and workmanship are highly creditable to the manufacturers, Messrs. Widdowson and Veale, of the Strand.

Mr. Fleming, having resigned his Chaplaincies abroad, is at present one of the Secretaries of the Incorporated Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

The following is the inscription:

Presented to the Rev. F. P. FLEMING, M.A., by the inhabitants of King William's Town, British Kaffraria, South Africa, as a small token of their affectionate regard and deep regret at his departure after four years of unremitting labour for their spiritual and temporal benefit. December 26, 1853.

BOOKS FOR PRESENTS.*

"Clover Cottage" is a lively story touching a widow and a bachelor. The latter has become proprietor of "a jewel of a cottage, embosomed in a wood abounding with game, on the banks of a stream swarming with trout and salmon." He is naturally impatient to enter upon possession, but the tenant happens to be a widow young, beautiful, and not deficient in stratagem. The various steps by which Mr. Solomon Windfall endeavours to obtain possession of his cottage, and the clever style in which Mrs. Wily circumvents him, give excellent scope for a good deal of smart dialogue, and two or three very effective scenes; the upshot being an amicable arrangement of the most satisfactory nature for both parties.

Mr. H. F. Chorley, to whom the English reader is indebted for a pleasant volume of tales from the French, entitled "Fairy Gold," had his attention called to them by a letter from Beranger to Lapointe, the author, in which the venerable poet says—"I have finished reading your tales, and am as thoroughly enchanted as any small child to whom, for the first time, some one has told the story of Tom Thumb. * * * I expect a second volume with impatience. Be quick over it. I am seventy-three; and children of my age have not the time to wait." The stories, which are full of exquisite fancy, of quaint humour and gentle wisdom, deserve to take their place beside those of Hans Andersen and Nathaniel Hawthorne.

Those who have read "A Boy's Voyages on board a Man-of-War and in the Merchant Service" do not require to be told what excellent stories of spirit-stirring adventure they will find in a new volume by the same author. Books of this description are generally supposed to be dangerous reading for boys, from their tendency to inspire a hankering after the life of a sailor. The author of "Whaling and Fishing" is not likely to do much harm in that way. Deeply interesting as the story is, there is not much in the scenes and incidents he describes that is calculated to make any one in love with life on board a whaler.

A certain love passage in the life of Jessie Cameron is the leading feature in a beautiful Highland story under that title, which frequently reminds us of Christopher North, in its charming simplicity and pathos. A Mr. Allister Stuart, assistant to the grieve, or land steward, on a Highland estate, falls in love with Jessie, who is the daughter of a widow in humble circumstances. For a while the course of true love runs as smooth as the most romantic novel-reader could desire. Allister proposes in due form, and is accepted. A new house is to be built for him and his intended wife, as he tells her, and she is left to receive the congratulations of friends and neighbours while he leaves the Highland glen for Ayrshire on his master's business. Unfortunately, for poor Jessie her betrothed is not a true man. During his visit to Ayrshire he becomes acquainted with "a very smart young lady, who had been educated at Miss M'Kissock's boarding-school in Ayr. She had a quantity of fair ringlets, a pink-and-white face, a stylish sort of figure, and dressed to the best of her ability according in the fashions in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS." Of course, the Lowland belle, with a fortune of £300, soon makes him forget the tocherless Highland maiden, whom he deserts in a very heartless manner. A number of episodes are interwoven with the main story, forming altogether a very truthful picture of Highland life as it transacts itself "in huts where poor men lie."

The story of "The Ocean Child" opens in the drawing-room of a pretty cottage on the Undercliff, in the Isle of Wight. A small family party, sitting round the comfortable fireside, with shutters closed and curtains drawn, is listening to the growling of a storm out of doors, and speculating on the dangers of the sea, when a signal gun is heard. A shipwreck takes place in the immediate neighbourhood, and the only person saved is a little girl—the ocean child who is adopted by Mrs. Howard, the tenant of the pretty cottage on the Undercliff. This mysterious infant is full of warm affection; but is afflicted with an ungovernable temper, which renders her childhood and early youth a chequered scene of showers and sunshine. At last, however, after many failures, she becomes mistress of herself, and the discovery is afterwards made that she is the daughter of Mrs. Howard's brother, who had been drowned in his attempt to reach the land on the night when the ocean child was saved.

The object which the author of "Our Eastern Empire" had in view, in compiling a very excellent juvenile book, was to inspire children with an interest in the history of British India. For this purpose she has brought together from the works of Mill and Thornton, the Essays of Macaulay, and other sources, some of the most striking incidents of the early days of our Indian Empire. These are told in an easy and natural way as part of the ordinary conversation in a well-educated family.

No writer of the present day is better known, or more generally liked, among the rising generation, than Captain Mayne Reid. His books of adventure are admirably adapted for youthful readers, and we have no doubt that "The Young Yagers," his contribution to the Christmas library for 1856, will make his name still more widely known than it has been hitherto. Those who have read "The Bush Boys," will be glad to renew their acquaintance with Hans, Hendrick, and Jan von Bloom, in the present story. They are now two or three years older than when they made their first appearance, but are still as fond of sport as ever, as may be guessed from the fact that the story opens on the southern bank of the Great Orange River, where the three "Boys" have encamped, along with some new acquaintances, who have joined them on a hunting expedition. The adventures with lions and lionesses, the "hairbreadth 'scapes," and startling incidents, with which the book is crowded, must make it a universal favourite.

Nothing interests young readers so much as stories of life at school. Of all Miss Martineau's tales, for example, we would back her "Crofton Boys" against all the rest she ever wrote, in the estimation of any jury composed of young persons. We do not say that "Sidney Grey" is equal to that charming narrative of youthful cares and troubles, but it will most assuredly take a place beside it in many a juvenile library. The story of the £5 note, which was stolen by one boy, who succeeded in fastening the charge of theft upon Sidney, the pattern scholar, is well carried through, to the final scene, where true poetical justice is rendered to all parties.

"John Maitland" is the story of an orphan girl, dependent upon a wealthy aunt, who, having had her head filled with great expectations, has very naturally become idle, proud, and vain. A series of reverses, however, throw her upon the world at the age of seventeen, with very little power to fight the hard battle of life; and, after a tedious course of mortification as governess and useful companion, she acquires sounder notions of duty, and in the last chapter of a pleasant juvenile story she is represented as a very successful schoolmistress, "never tired of relating her adventures and the troubles into which she had been led by her idleness and her false notions of gentility.

Two heroines—Beatrice Courtenay, the daughter of an Italian lady and an English gentleman, who gambled away his fortune at Baden-Baden; and Judith Maxwell, the only daughter of a long-headed Scotch steward, who worms himself into the possession of his employer's estate and castle—are symbolised in a two-volume narrative, as the "Myrtle and the Heather." Beatrice is a paragon of beauty, and sings like an angel. By going on the stage she might easily have earned a fortune and a name. But a promise to her dying father that she would never adopt that profession, forbids her acceptance of the flattering offers made by enterprising managers. After a course of probation, in which she suffers much from the selfish caprice of a Lady St. Helens, who patronises her for a while and then quarrels with her for not being sufficiently compliant, Beatrice becomes the wife of Horace Lindsay, the nephew and heir of Sir Roderick Lindsay, whose steward is the father of Judith Maxwell, the Highland heroine of the story. The part played by the latter in the complicated drama is a very noble one, but it would require more space than we can afford to give even an outline of it. The story is well told, although not of that class of novels which we would recommend to the lovers of the "fast" school of fiction.

"The Good Old Times," by the author of "Mary Powell," is not a story for the million; indeed, the writer never addresses herself to ordinary readers, nor would she succeed, probably, if she made the attempt. But it has qualities which will ensure its success among all who can enjoy a simple and truthful picture of ordinary life. What admirable skill the writer displays in her brief sketch of the merry party, seated round the blazing fire in Mère Susanne's kitchen, roasting chestnuts and breaking hearts! For, as the Scottish poet sings—

> Love may lowe in cottage low
> As well 's in lofty ha'.

The story, which is of rather a slight texture, relates chiefly to the indefatigable efforts of the Reformers in Auvergne to spread the new doctrines among the peasantry, and of the no less unwearied attempts of the ecclesiastical power to put down the heretical insurrection against authority.

The author of "Florence Templar; or, My Aunt's Story" has adopted the autobiographic form. The narrative has not much of plot or incident, but there is story enough to carry the reader pleasantly on from the first chapter to the last page without pause or weariness. Florence Templar, with whom the narrator becomes acquainted at an early stage of her history, is a great beauty and an heiress. She is surrounded by crowds of admirers, but only two are specially introduced. Mr. Graham, the member for Templar Cross; and Captain Sutton, who happens to be "my aunt's cousin." The latter is evidently the favourite in the estimation of the story-teller; indeed, he must have been incomparably superior to his rival in personal attraction. But Mr. Graham, who had recently returned from India with a large fortune, and who seems to have understood how to win a lady's favour, soon distances the poor captain. The latter is in despair, although not on his own account, as he tries to persuade himself. He cannot bear the thought that Florence is about to become the wife of a scoundrel, and therefore he seeks an interview, in which he tries to open her eyes to the true character of the nabob. Here the author introduces an incident which we cannot remember ever having met before in any novel—English, French, German, or American. Captain Sutton, it appears, had been attacked with small-pox at the very moment when he went to see Florence. She is struck with the same frightful malady, and, after an alarming illness, the proud beauty rises from a bed of sickness so changed in appearance as to wish herself dead. Of course she is deserted by Mr. Graham, who is a devoted worshipper of beauty; leaving the course open to Captain Sutton, if he had chosen to return. But he had gone to sea while these events were happening, and does not return till she is almost at the verge of the grave, having been cruelly used by the nabob, who runs away with her brother's wife, and thus justifies the warning which Sutton gave us to his character. The story, which is told in a quiet graphic style, ends happily, in spite of the various troubles by which the denouement is preceded.

With the exception of Captain Marryat, we know of no English author who will compare with Mr. Kingston as a writer of books of nautical adventure. To those who have already become familiar with his former stories, it will be enough to say that "Neil D'Arcy" his last novel shows no falling off in the lively, delightful, vein of its author.

"Curiosities of History" is a sort of holiday book, illustrating not a few of the uses of schooldom, in explaining the every-day applications of classic lore and historic incident, so often employed by public writers of the present day in newspapers and elsewhere. Thus, it is worth knowing that Athens had her "Wooden Wall" as well as England; and Rome her "Cap of Liberty" as well as John Wilkes: whence come the phrases of Passing the Rubicon; Cleansing the Augean Stable; and being like Argus, with his Hundred Eyes; what is Breaking Prescian's Head with the Donat; were the Labours of Hercules, and the Greek Kalends; the Brazen Bull of Phalaris, the Iron Cage of Tamerlane, the Sword of Damocles, and the Ear of Dionysius; why Alcibiades cut off his dog's tail; how Dido founded Carthage, and Hannibal cut through the Alps with vinegar; and why what were the Seven Wise Men of Greece, the Seven Hills of Rome, and the Seven Ages of Man; the Laws of Solon and Draco, Justinian and Napoleon I.; who built Baalbec? where was Homer born? was Belisarius blind? and who was the Man in the Iron Mask? In our own history is an abundant crop of errors, doubts, and romantic perversions and phrases, which have passed from the lips of kings, heroes, and statesmen into the every-day parlance of the people. Such are a few of the "Curiosities" which are packed into this little book, under some 600 heads, including ten times as many events, incidents, sayings and origins, and noteworthy instances of human action. The book is an extension of the plan of the author's volume of "Things Not Generally Known," to the popular illustration of the most interesting points of history.

OMNIBUS TRAMWAYS.—The Passy omnibuses start from the Place de la Concorde for Passy (and vice versâ) every half hour. As there is only one line of rails laid down along the public road (and sunk into it so as to allow of other carriages driving over it, it is so arranged that the omnibus each way does not start until its consort has arrived. They stop once or twice to take up and set down passengers, and at these stopping-places double lines are laid down for a few yards, so as to admit of two carriages passing each other if it should be at any time necessary; but these precautions seem superfluous, as the carriage itself can be drawn for a short distance on the ordinary road should it be required. The rail omnibuses are extremely large, comfortable and roomy—having the appearance of two or three railway carriages joined together. Each contains inside and outside sixty-one passengers; they are always full, and in fine weather overflowing, their great advantage being that the motion is as easy as that of a first-class railway carriage, and that, although only drawn by the usual kind of steel horses, they perform in less than ten minutes a distance which in a common road omnibus requires a long half-hour of fatiguing jolting. The establishment of such a mode of communication would be the greatest boon to the inhabitants of Kensington, Bayswater, and many other places similarly situated

GREAT STORM IN THE SOUTH OF FRANCE.—The Messager de Bayonne of the 31st ult. states that that part of the country had been visited by a violent storm, which continued three days. During the whole time the thunder scarcely ceased roaring. A number of the streams of water in the neighbourhood overflowed their banks, in consequence of the heavy rain, but it was hoped that the mischief done would not be very considerable. Several accidents were caused by the lightning, the most serious being at Villefranque, where a Custom-house officer was killed while writing at his desk. At Hasparren the electric fluid entered a room where six persons were sitting round the fireplace. Three of them were struck by it—one of them, an old woman, having her hair burnt, and a severe wound inflicted on her head. At Bayonne, however, during that precaution had been taken to place the electric apparatus in communication with the ground, so great was the influence of the fluid that the telegraph office was filled with sparks, and part of the apparatus melted. At Lyons, on New Year's Day, the snow was so deep in the streets that they were almost impassable for pedestrians

THE CUBAN SLAVE TRADE.—We have been informed by a person who is attached to the schooner Emily now in this port, from the Grand Caymanas, that an American brigantine named Nesemiah Hunt arrived at that island about a month ago, after having landed 385 slaves in Cuba. She bought at the Caymanas 12 tons of guano at 10 dollars per ton, and employed eleven men at the rate of 50 dollars per month for the chief mate, 30 dollars cash for the second mate and boatswain, and 25 dollars each for common seamen. It was evident that the Nehemiah Hunt was about returning to the coast of Africa for another cargo of human beings, as the captain purchased a large quantity of provisions, poultry, &c., &c., and a lot of turtle. Truly, the slave-traders are becoming more and more emboldened, when they fearlessly enter a British port, and employ British subjects to assist them. We trust, therefore, that the authorities at head-quarters in Spanish Town will adopt measures that will in future render nugatory any further attempt to hire seamen at the Caymanas for the prosecution of the infamous traffic.—Falmouth (Jamaica), Post, Dec. 3.

FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION OF MODERN FLEMISH PICTURES

THE success of the French Exhibition in Pall-mall has led to a similar one of pictures by living Belgian artists, well worth a visit at this season of the year, when the Royal Academy and other native exhibitions are in abeyance. And this exhibition is the more creditable, inasmuch as Wappers, Gallait, Thomas, de Keyser, and Verboeckhoven do not exhibit on this occasion.

Ferdinand de Brackeleer has two pictures, Nos. 7 and 8—the former "The Wandering Minstrel," the latter "The Proposal." This artist resembles our own Faed in the pleasing, familiar, and natural treatment of peasant life: the colour and chiaroscuro are very fine, but his touch is disagreeably wanting in breadth and vigour, so as to be what the French critics call lâché! In expression he attempts nothing bold or eccentric; but, within the limited range that he has marked out for himself, excluding all strength of passion and emotion, he is perfectly natural, and therefore pleasing.

No. 89. "A Poor Woman Arrested as a Vagabond," by Alfred Stevens. This is a very striking picture, the colouring very cold but forcible, the action pathetic but in no way exaggerated. The principal figure is, of course, the poor woman, with two wretched children, conducted by gens d'armes to a dépôt de mendicité. The picture has no background to interfere with the action, being a simple wall capped with snow; but we think it a mistake on the part of the artist that the sympathies of the spectator and the observance of the law are in collision.

No. 91. "Old Flemish House," Francois de Stroobant.—This is an interesting piece of architecture of the Spanish period. The locality is, we believe, Mechlin. In no part of Europe was the passage from Pointed Gothic to the Renaissance signalised by a more luxuriant fancy than in Belgium, being coincident with the commercial wealth of the country immediately before the rise of the Dutch Republic. Mr. Stroobant is highly successful in such efforts, making a felicitous selection, and executing with truth and vigour of handling.

No. 62. "Landscape with Cattle," by Adolph de Knyff.—The character of the landscape is essentially Flemish, the high trees: the absence of leafy underwood, the pastures, and the luxuriant aquatic vegetation, are faithful transcripts of the features of the Campine, but without anything like the vapid pea green monotony usual in such subjects.

Nos. 103 and 104. "The Fruit Market" and the "Poultry Market," by Van Schendel, showing great mechanical ingenuity in the management of candlelight and other effects. This class of pictures was much overrated a generation ago; but now they are visited with, we think, too unmeasured contempt. There is always a large class of persons to whom the literal imitation of a curious foreign scene will always give pleasure.

No. 10. "The Lake of the Four Cantons, Switzerland," is a landscape in which the aspects of the Alps and their vegetation are treated with a high degree of truth and beauty. M. Calame is a Swiss artist, famous for his delineations of pine foliage.

No. 15, "A Coast Scene," by Clays; and No. 18, "Arabs," by Joseph Goomans, are also by artists of high repute both in Paris and Brussels.

MALTA: ITS TOWN BUILDINGS AND FORTIFICATIONS.

We have recently seen a series of Views of the above stronghold and Queen of the Mediterranean, executed by Mr. Robertson, of the Imperial Mint of Constantinople, whose name is so well known in connection with Eastern photography.

It is sufficient to say that these views fully maintain the well-merited reputation this gentleman has acquired by his former works; lacking the thrilling interest of his Crimean productions, they have still a deep and serious importance, showing as they do so truthfully the full extent and impregnable character of this our watchtower in Eastern Europe.

Considered as photographs, these views appear to be nearly all of equal merit; but there are some which, taken as subjects, are naturally more interesting than others. Among these we would particularise the Porta Reale, three views of the fortifications which are marvels of strength and solidity, the Auberge de Castile, and a portrait, if we may use the expression, of that magnificent line-of-battle ship the Duke of Wellington, as she lay in Malta harbour.

Our readers will be glad to hear that Mr. Robertson is about to supply a want which has long been felt by all classes, but more especially by those of the religious world; and proposes illustrating immediately, in a series of photographic views, Jerusalem and the Holy Places.

We look forward with much pleasure to the opportunity which will be given us by this truthful art to trace step by step the progress of Our Lord during his earthly pilgrimage; and wish Mr. Robertson every success in this most interesting and important undertaking.

THE NEW PHOTO-GALVONOGRAPHIC PROCESS.

THE discovery of the Daguerréotype opened up an entirely new field of science and art;—its importance having been since shown, not so much by the first products of Daguerre's discovery, remarkable as they were, as by subsequent ramifications, the terminations of which we cannot as yet even divine. Of photography alone we may say that, in relation to the daguerréotype, the daughter is fairer than the mother. The discovery we describe may be called another of this progeny, perhaps still more wonderful. Thus a truly great idea propagates itself. A new principle once arrived at, the fresh-springing genius of the succeeding generation never rests in the attempt at novel application and novel combination. Chemistry created a new art, and art in her turn opens the door of the cognate sciences to accomplish her purpose and abridge her processes.

The photograph turns the sun into a painter; the above process supervenes, and turns voltaic electricity into an engraver on copper, by one of the most curious inventions of the age. The Photo-Galvanographic process of engraving is capable of producing printing-plates giving every detail of nature as found in the photograph, or of rendering touch for touch the drawing or painting of the artist and draughtsman. A few weeks are sufficient for the production of finished plates, some of which—as, for example, those from photographs of the human hand—could never engrave, or, if imitated by manual engraving, would require years of unremitting labour. In the primary steps of the Photo-Galvanographic process the operator coats a glass plate with a gelatinous solution suitably prepared with chemical ingredients sensitive to light; the plate so coated is exposed to the light in contact with the print or drawing to be copied. This relievo plate is then moulded, and the mould placed in the electrotype battery, producing a thin raised copperplate called the matrix, which serves for obtaining finally by electrotype the intaglio printing-plate.

The ordinary photograph on fine and expensive paper especially prepared is the basis of the operation, and the sum of the five processes, including the double electrotype, is to present a reversed plate, a disadvantage which will, no doubt, be got over by some ingenuity. The most beautiful specimen we have seen is a "Don Quixote in his Study," composed and photographed from the life by Mr. Lake Price, whose name is well known as that of a most dexterous and scientific photographer, for, although the sun is the great parent of this progeny, there are skilful and unskilful midwives in the process of delivery. The proof has all the truth of photography, and all the delicacy of mezzotint—minus, of course, that conventional compromise between the highest lights and the middle tints, which having been so long a custom with the graver appears to us as second nature. The results of the new process are in effect of light a sort of medium between the harshly-lit photograph and the softened mezzotint, to which we can alone compare it, for it is far finer and more delicate than any stone engraving that ever was produced. This softness is attained by slightly repassing the copperplate. Another most important advantage is its enduring permanency, which, although short of that of the ordinary copperplate, far exceeds the ephemeral usual photograph. This splendid discovery was made by Herr Pretsch, director of the Imperial printing-office of Vienna, and forms, in our opinion, an epoch in that combination of science and art which educes representation from sunlight.

THE GREAT DINING-HALL AT SOMERLEYTON.

SOMERLEYTON HALL.

Among the best evidences of the munificent patronage of Art in the present day is the artistic spirit displayed in the interior decoration of mansions erected for persons of opulence and taste; a remarkable instance of which liberal spirit has been shown by Sir Samuel Morton Peto, in "the proper house and home" which has lately been built for his residence at Somerleyton, in the county of Suffolk. We have selected for illustration two of the most beautiful portions of the mansion. First is

THE DINING-HALL.

The dimensions of this magnificent apartment are—34 feet in length, 24 feet wide, and about 22 feet high. The ceiling is divided into four compartments, all of which are enriched by beautiful floral ornaments, within a circle; these are heightened by a little colour and gildings. From the centre ornament depends an elegant glass chandelier. The massive beams which divide the ceiling into compartments are highly ornamented with roses and leaves, also heightened with gold. The segmental arches supporting these beams are enriched in the same way, and rest, or rather spring from, corbels of good design, composed alternately of a boar's head and spears and a stag's head, both surrounded by fruit and flowers. At the intersections of the beams are bold pendants, all heightened by colour and gold.

The panels on the eastern side, opposite the windows, above the wainscoting, are filled in with three paintings—the subjects taken from the life of Alfred the Great. The centre one represents Alfred in the Danish camp—this is by Maclise; the next, his education by his mother; and the third shows him at his inventions. The two latter are by Herbert. The panels of the wainscoting, on each side the fireplace, are to be filled with two subjects, by Clarkson Stanfield. They are already painted, but not yet placed. One represents the towing of the Victory, with the dead body of Nelson on board, already familiar to the visitors of the Royal Academy, it having been exhibited a year or two back. The other represents the "Storming of St. Sebastian."

The panels at either end of the room north and south are also decorated by a fine painting. One, a fine "Fruit-piece," by Lance; the other, "The Holy Family," by T. Uwins. The hall is lighted by two sets of windows: the upper ones being filled with stained glass, the lower are plain.

A little out of the hall, over the line of wainscoting, is placed a large looking-glass, that at the southern end can be pushed aside, and display the fine organ. This, of course, takes the place of minstrels, being placed in that part formerly allotted to them, and thence called the Minstrels' Gallery. The effect produced by the introduction of the plate of glass is remarkably good, enlivening the upper part of the wall by the repetition of the ceiling, with its varied light and shade. The furniture, which is of solid oak, will strike the visitor by its boldness of design, the sideboards and fire-screen particularly.

The mansion has a chastely-decorated vestibule at the front entrance, and is lined with oak and marbles, floored with encaustic tiles, and lighted by a skylight filled with stained glass. This, next to the Winter Garden, might be called the gem of the place.

The Library is a good specimen of the time of James I., and is lined with carved oak. It is rather low in proportion to its area, but it has an air of agreeable comfort about it truly pleasing. The views from the windows is on to the terrace and gardens on the western side of the building. Next is

THE WINTER GARDEN.

This truly elegant building is situated on the north side of the hall and is entered either from the drawing-room or by doors opening from the north or west sides. The general form is a square, divided by avenues branching from a centre in the form of a cross. Over the centre rises an elegant cupola and lantern; this is supported by sixteen light columns of nice proportions, and capped with foliated capitals. The shafts of these centre columns are enriched with a raised arabesque ornament of a cream-coloured tint upon a yellow ground; the bases are enriched with a painted line or border of warm chocolate colour and blue. The columns supporting the divisions are less ornamented, but are still in keeping, and serve to concentrate the richness of appearance to the centre, around the fountain, which occupies a considerable space in the centre. Above the caps of the columns surrounding the fountain rise the arches which support the cupola, forming a spandril at the drum of this cupola: this drum is pierced for lights as well as the lantern. At night this dome can be lighted by gas, a ring of jets being placed at the base of the lantern. Suspended from the ribs, corresponding with the four avenues, are eight wire baskets, from which hang in graceful negligence lovely creepers. The walk between the basin and the flowers is roofed with glass, supported by Saracenic arches, whose spandrils are filled with a handsome pattern, coloured pale blue; from each of these arches is suspended a basket of similar form for creepers and plants of that character. Between the columns of the outer circle are placed large jars: these are of blue, with white flowers, and chocolate and white, for plants of choice odour, or bloom. In the avenue fronting the drawing-room windows stand two elegant alabaster jars: between these jars are placed statues, four in number, taken from the works of Shakspeare, Milton, Scott, and Moore, representing "Ophelia," the "Lady of the Lake," the "Lady of Erin," and "L'Allegro." These figures are from the chisel of Mr. J. Thomas. On each side the avenue, fronting the drawing-room, is a magnificent alabaster vase of finest workmanship, each standing upon a plinth of material, having bases of white marble. The angular space formed by the square outward form of the building, and the circular basin for the fountain, is filled up with exotic plants, whose varied green contrasts agreeably with the light colour of the building, and the statues; at intervals, along the avenues are arranged vases and flowers. The walls and piers, between the windows, are fitted up for climbing plants, whose roots have a resting in deep borders of earth, supported in front by encaustic tiles of lively pattern. At the northern end, on either side of the entrance, is placed a handsome cage of cast iron, of elegant design: they are in yellow and gilded, and enriched with stained glass. In one of the cages are seen small foreign birds, and in the other canaries, whose little throats fill the air with melody, and break the stillness, which would otherwise reign around, except when broken by the gentle plash of the fountain, which next attracts attention. This is a graceful object. The base has a dolphin on each [illegible] from whose mouths issue a stream of water; their tails support a basin which receives the drops from the convolvulus-formed streams issuing from the hand of a graceful female figure, at whose feet [illegible] play. Around the [illegible] avenues, and base [illegible] of this unique structure [illegible] effect when approached by the north [illegible]. The clear red of the bricks, contrasted with the bold [illegible] quoins, pillared portas, [illegible] ns, have something fairy-like about it. The interior at night, when lighted by its well-arranged gas jets, is quite a scene of enchantment. This garden, as well as the whole of the grounds, are under the able direction of Mr. Bradley.

THE VILLA

The whole of the building, including the winter garden, has been designed by, and executed under the care of, Mr. J. Thomas, and reflects much credit on his taste.

THE VILLAGE OF SOMERLEYTON.

While the philanthropic owner of Somerleyton Hall has been studious of his own ease, he has been equally mindful of the welfare of his neighbours. Sir Morton has built the neat and picturesque village for their abeds close to the grounds of the Hall. The houses are particularly neat and well-finished, each containing six rooms fitted with every convenience and comfort. There are thirty-five in number. The whole are occupied by labouring men, who are allowed to reside in them for a very small sum per week. Each house has its garden nicely kept in order; and there is a shop which supplies the village with its grocery and linendrapery, besides which it is a post-office. The village has also its police-station. On the green shown in our View, the children of the villages may be seen gambolling about. The Chapel represented in the same View is not complete at present. We should mention seven or eight of the residences are allotted to widows, and the whole has been raised by the munificence of Sir Moreton Peto for the benefit of the poor around his domains.

Somerleyton, commonly abbreviated into Somerley, lies on the left of the railway from Reedham to Lowestoft. It is a fine old hall, built in the time of Elizabeth, but much altered in the reign of James II., by Admiral Sir Thomas Alleyne, of Lowestoft. Fuller observes of it that "it well deserved the name of Summerly, because it was always summer there, the walks and gardens being planted with perpetual greens." In the time of the Conqueror it was possessed by William Earl of Warren and Surrey; next by the Osbornes; then, through the marriage of Isabella Fitzosbert with Walter Jernegan, by "the famous knightly family" of the Jernegans of Jerninghame; and then by Sir Thomas Wentworth, whose eventual heiress, Elizabeth Wentworth, became the wife of Charles Gaskin, Esq., of Kentford, Suffolk, and conveyed Somerleyton to her husband. By their grandson, Thomas Garneys, Esq., the estate was sold, and afterwards came by purchase to the Sir Thomas Alleyne, or Allin, already mentioned, whose son, dying bachelor, devised it to Richard Anguish, Esq., his sister's husband, on condition of his taking the name and arms of Allin. By him Somerleyton was bequeathed to Lord Sydney Godolphin Osborne, of whom it was purchased by Mr. (now Sir Samuel Morton) Peto, in 1846, for whom the hall has been nearly rebuilt in the Anglo-Italian style. The names and rank of the historic possessors of the property are preserved in the painted windows, which are heraldically emblazoned with the effigies and arms of the Fitzosberts, Jernegans, Wentworths, Allins, Anguishes, and Osbornes. Among these stands out the fame of Admiral Sir Thomas Alleyne, who was a zealous Royalist, and, obtaining a command in the King's navy after the Restoration, had more than one victorious conflict with the Dutch, who, in his day, may almost be said to have divided the supremacy of the sea with England, for they almost as often beat as they were beaten. We are indebted for these genealogical details to Sir Bernard Burke's very interesting "Visitation of Seats and Arms," vol. I.

LITERATURE.

THE OBSTRUCTIVES AND THE MAN; or, the Forces and the Future of Europe. Stanford.

This is an ambitious work, its author aspiring to rectify the political map of Europe. He brings to his subject varied and extensive information, and an earnest, though somewhat unchastened, spirit. Perhaps there is more bitterness infused into the volume than becomes a public teacher, in whom calmness is a virtue. Whenever the writer alludes to Austria he travels from Dan to Beersheba, and "finds it all barren." On the other hand, his eulogy on Napoleon III. is extravagant, for he is exalted to the rank of a demigod. Kossuth, however, is placed on the same lofty pedestal as the Emperor of the French. They are described as the "mighty representative men of this crisis," and "in action" we are told to "consider them as one rather than as two." The great Corsican and his nephew are elevated above humanity. "It is not the habit of Napoleons to fall till they are touched by the visible hand of God. They fall when they profane the ark of national right, not by mortal prowess. Napoleon is a principle; he speaks now by deeds, for he is a power, and he is France." Is it not true, however, that Louis Napoleon, when President, swore to uphold the French republic? and is it not equally true that he violated his oath? Since this book was published, has he not presented the cordon of the Legion of Honour to Marshal O'Donnell for destroying the constitutional liberties of Spain? We concur in the praise accorded to Sardinia, as the rising star of Italian freedom; but we do not accept the author's views of the future policy of the United States. "America," we are told, "yearns for naval supremacy. A marine is her natural and certain vent of her enterprise, for her coasts invite it, and her inland navigation nurtures it. America is only too sure, without any prompting or facilitating from Russia, to rival us on the seas." Mr. Marcy distinctly contradicts this prediction in his reply to the Count De Sartiges, French Ambassador at Washington, on the new maritime code accepted by the Congress of Paris:—"The United States," observes the American Secretary, "consider powerful navies and large standing armies, as permanent establishments, to be detrimental to national prosperity. The expense of keeping them up is burdensome to the people. They are, in the opinion of this Government, none the less means to peace among nations." The Czar, the Kaisar, and Lord Palmerston are represented as the great enemies of liberty the triumvirate of despotism. "Russia is the armed opponent of all human interests. Austria is the jackall of despotism. Do our statesmen reserve England for the climax? Would they make England the Judas of Civilisation?" Lord Palmerston is addressed in the following terms:—"You are the first of your craft, such as it is. You are foremost of a brotherhood of statesmen, among whom to be ranked at all is a danger and a reproach. . . . You have assisted at the suppression of nationalities, exchanged compliments over their graves, and sat yourself down, unlike an angel of light, hard by their several tombs, watching that the seals set thereon be not broken, nor the souls of them leap from their cerements to the day." One of the leading propositions of the writer is the restoration of the down-trodden nationalities of Poland, Hungary, and Italy.

From this general view of the subject we pass to the details and the mode of treatment. The author commences with a chart of the great revolutionary policy of Great Britain since 1772, the object of which is to show that during the whole period the British Government has been antagonistic to freedom a charge enforced by a formidable array of facts. When the partitioning Powers announced to the several Courts of Europe that they had parcelled out Poland among themselves, George III. was "willing to suppose that the three Courts are convinced of the justice of their respective pretensions, although his Majesty is not informed of the reasons of their conduct, and, in reply to a direct appeal from the King of Poland, the King of England professed to have "seen with extreme pain the evils which surround his Majesty," but considered that "those ills had arrived at a point at which they cannot be redressed except by the hand of the Almighty." In 1783 Sardinia, supported by France, called the attention of England to the Russian encroachments in the Crimea, but England declined any interference. In 1812 England persuaded Turkey to sign the Treaty of Bucharest, by which Russia acquired a footing on the Danube. In 1813 we enabled the Czar to retain Finland by wresting Norway from Denmark, and giving it to Sweden as a compensation. In 1815 we restored Sicily to Naples, without stipulating on behalf of the Sicilians for the maintenance of that free constitution we had bestowed on that island, and thus abandoned the liberalism we had professed. In 1827 we played the game of Russia by destroying the Turkish fleet at Navarino. In 1831, when the Polish Envoy, M. Walewski, implored the aid of England, supported at that time by the Cabinet of Vienna, who offered to restore Gallicia to Poland, Lord Palmerston replied that "the time for interference had not arrived." In 1848-49 Lord Palmerston allowed Hungary to succumb; refusing to listen to her Envoys, except through Austria, which amounted to abandonment, if not to direct hostility. These are some of the charges; but the list is far from being exhausted.

Though the style of the author is, generally, clear, pure, and vigorous, it is too often grossly disfigured by a spasmodic straining after effect, and displays the worst possible taste. We here give a specimen, which embodies his political view of England and Austria.

> The British Lion was a Lion in the days of Cromwell and the Covenant. Its roar was heard across the Atlantic, and its bound feared across the Alps. But the restoration came of the Church and of the Stuarts. The British Lion was stolen by Rome as it came out of the conventicle. Its tail was tucked between its legs, its whiskers were trimmed, and its roar abated skins as of dead Charles I. poodledom were sewed neatly over its carcase, and it was trotted up and down the politico-ecclesiastical market of Europe, warranted a splendid specimen of the genuine original Austro Stuart breed. Nevertheless, in the Romish kennel it would not lie down. Though drugged with the opium of the Vatican, shut up in the Romish cage with the happy family and menageries-royal of the beasts and birds of Europe. When it was thought fit for a house-dog in Germany, its keepers drove in the stakes at Vienna, the tether was told out, and the litter laid; and the Lion, muzzled and tape-tangled, went up and down round Austria, guarding its precincts, and decoying other lions who feared the roar of England, but did not know its chains—as they came up with the swelling of the waters of the Rhine, the Po, and the Danube, or the Vistula—into the toils set on its borders. When the political pivot began to turn, the lion roared, and ramped blindly back on the Rhine. Since then the old fable has been reversed. Britain and Austria—the Lion and the Ass—have hunted in couples. The Eagle still soars in the sun beyond their reach; but the roar of the Lion has frightened the prey under the heels of the Ass; and Austria, wrapping her carrion in the calfskin that Shakspeare flung her, lurks privily still at the corners and cataclysis of events, and crouches at the turning-points of crises to seize upon prey that may be helpless.

If this is offered to the public as a sample of fine writing, we submit that the author has made a mistake, for it is unmitigated rant and fustian.

The chapter on the Balance of Power contains some sound reflections, and is introduced by many valuable quotations from eminent statesmen. Since Russia emerged from her deserts the international relations of Europe have been completely revolutionised. Charles V. of Spain, Louis XIV., and Napoleon aspired to universal monarchy, and failed. Cardinal Richelieu destroyed the earlier preponderance of Austria; and the combined forces of England, Austria, and Holland frustrated the ambitious designs of France under the Grand Monarque. Since those days Holland, Spain, and Venice have sunk into helplessness; and the house of Brandenberg, ruling at Berlin, has competed (and still competes) for Germanic supremacy with the house of Hapsburg. Sweden has never rallied since the defeat at Pultawa; and, while her provinces, since that fatal day, have fallen by shreds into the power of the Muscovite, she vainly remembers the time when her flag floated over Narva, and the Palatines of Poland occupied Smolensko and Moscow. Russia, having seized Poland and Finland, has erected herself into Europe, and, encamping within a comparatively short distance of Vienna and Berlin, has completely disturbed the old equilibrium of power, which our author seeks to readjust by restitution. The partition of Poland "constituted the present international Lynch law, on which Russia has since presumed, and Europe is now balanced upon bayonets." But it should be borne in mind that Russia succeeded as much by the cunning of diplomacy as by force of arms. Peter the Great advised his people to marry the Germans and trade with the English; and, when Catherine II. was planning the dismemberment of Poland, she wrote to Henry Prince of Prussia, "I will frighten Turkey; I will flatter England; do you take upon yourself to buy over Austria, that she may amuse France." Of every mistake committed by the Western Powers Russia has availed herself with singular adroitness. When it was too late Louis XV. exclaimed, "I would rather have sold my last carriage than have permitted the seizure of Poland!" English blundering enabled Alexander I. to occupy and retain Finland; and the late Austrian Concordat with Rome has shaken the loyalty of all those Austrians of Sclavonic race who profess the Russo-Greek faith.

The great battle now impending on Europe is one of principle, not of dynasty; it is the decisive struggle of liberty against despotism; and our author thus ranges the forces on either side in this fearful encounter, classifying them into PEOPLES, MEN, and PRINCIPLES:—

> Napoleon III., the French and English peoples, the Protestant faith, and the Italian, Hungarian, and Polish nationalities Against—the Russian system (of which the Czar is a part) and people, the German army (not the people, which is partly Sclavonic and partly liberal) and Austria, with the French and English Oligarchy.

In submitting this view of the European problem, great stress is laid on the reply of Louis Napoleon to the Polish address, in which he said—"I expected such a manifestation from you. Hitherto I have not been able to do what I could have wished for your country; but the march of events now permits me to hope that I may be useful to you in continuing the work commenced by him whose heir I am." In completing this scheme for reconstructing the political map of Europe, and restoring the independence of Poland, Louis Napoleon is to paralyse Austria and seize the Rhenish frontier, take Savoy for France, and give Lombardy, and perhaps Venetia, to Sardinia, we say perhaps, for our author puts a query as to Venetia, on which he has evidently not yet made up his mind. There is another combination in which the fertile imagination of our author indulges. The Circassian, the Turk, the Hungarian, the Pole, and the men of Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Finland, would be a combination before which Europe would pause. Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, constituting the Scandinavian family, are to form a balance against Russian ascendancy in the Baltic; and Finland must be restored to Sweden, otherwise she will form a nursery of seamen for the Russian navy.

We have now placed before our readers the leading doctrines or dogmas of this book, in which an end is proposed, and the means are provided for attaining to that end. The whole policy recommended appears to us a mixture of sound feelings and fanciful hypotheses. The paralysis of Austria and the seizure of the Rhenish frontier by France, which, if we rightly understand the author, are conditions precedent to the reconstruction of Poland, are stumbling-blocks in the way not so easily removed as he appears to imagine. Prussia will soon be as closely allied to England as, during the reign of Nicholas, she was to Russia, and that alliance may operate a very important change in the politics of Europe, though to this dynastic change no allusion is made. Perhaps England would demur to Prussia being despoiled of her Rhenish provinces, nor is she deeply interested in paralysing Austria. After all, why should France preponderate any more than Russia?

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES V. By W. ROBERTSON, D.D. With an Account of the Emperor's Life after his Abdication. By WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT. Two volumes. Geo. Routledge and Co.

Much has of late been written concerning the eventful life of the Emperor Charles V., yet Robertson still remains the best historian of this truly remarkable man. Mr. Stirling has given us a quaint but rather fanciful account of the closter life of the most renowned of the modern imitators of Diocletian; and Messieurs Amédée Pichot, Mignet, and Gachard have, by their commendable researches, thrown much light upon various portions of his extraordinary career. The consequence is, that Charles V. now stands forth in bold relief, and his character is understood and appreciated as well as that of any of the great actors in history with which we are acquainted. Mr. Prescott whose name has long been distinguished in literature, comes forward to put the crown to the column, by publishing a new edition of Robertson's "Charles V." with four additional books of his own composition. In this manner he renders Robertson's history a full and complete work, enriching it with those details which recent industrious investigation has rescued from the ravages of time. Mr. Prescott brings the book down to the present day; and, as it is not very likely, after the rigid scrutiny that has been instituted in this subject, that any further discoveries of importance will be made, Robertson's "History of Charles V.," improved and enlarged by Prescott, bids fair to remain the standard authority. It contains all details any reasonable man can desire to know of this illustrious hermit-monarch—at one moment plunged in the mysteries of state policy, at another discussing the composition of some new edibles. Robertson shows us the warrior and statesman as he appeared amid the din and battle of a rather stormy existence in troublous times. Mr. Prescott continues the story by describing the man in the romantic solitudes of the monastery of Yuste. Charles had resigned the diadem, but he could not lay aside the love of ruling nor the cares of state. His perpetual anxiety to be something, his love of the direction of state affairs, his occasional fits of ill-humour, his rebuke for the pleasures of the table, all help to form one of the strongest characters that ever came across the page of history. There is plenty of moral in such a life. Charles the recluse in the mountain convent brings Charles the Emperor into more prominent notice. Mankind love to contemplate these violent contrasts in the condition of one person, and the fact that the change is self-imposed only serves to heighten the general interest. Many have greatness thrust upon them, and others are borne by the wave of circumstances into positions for which they are not fitted by possessing either virtues or mental qualifications; yet few voluntarily drop the robes of authority, quit the busy scenes of the struggle, carrying their greatness and glory with them into their retirement. This is what Charles to a certain extent accomplished, and it is this which renders his fame more enduring. His history is a romance without the fiction, or truth in its most attractive garb. Mr. Prescott has added another wreath to his chaplet. In following in the steps of Robertson, enriching the works of his predecessor while adding a volume to his own, he has shown that the high position which he holds among living writers is one to which he is in every respect entitled.

THE HISTORY AND ANTIQUITIES OF BOSTON, AND THE VILLAGES COMPRISING THE HUNDRED OF SKIRBECK, IN THE COUNTY OF LINCOLN. By P. THOMPSON. Illustrated with One Hundred Engravings. London: Longman and Co.

Mr. Emerson, in his "English Traits," makes a remark regarding the endless wealth of England, and the marvellous importance of many of its small towns, which must have occurred to many a reader of county and other local histories. "I reply," he says, "to all the urgencies that refer me to this and that object indispensably to be seen—yes, to see England well needs a hundred years; for what they told me was the merit of Sir John Soane's museum in London—that it was well packed and well saved is the merit of England: it is stuffed full, in all corners and crevices, with towns, towers, churches, villas, palaces, hospitals, and charity-houses." Let anyone look into this history of Boston, for example—although, compared with scores of mushroom towns in America, which have not lasted a quarter of a century, it might hide its diminished head, at least so far as size is concerned. At the last Census it contained only 18,967 inhabitants. And yet what an interesting series of events have been crowded into that little spot of ground, from the time that St. Botolph built a monastery there, A.D. 654, to the erection of the Athenæum and the Corn Exchange in the market-place of Boston within the last few years!

Mr. Thompson, in writing the history of his native district, has gone the right way to work for making a truly valuable book. More than half a century ago he began collecting materials for a "History of Boston." In 1820 he published an interesting volume of these materials, under the modest title of "Collections for a Topographical and Historical Account of Boston, and the Hundred of Skirbeck, in the County of Lincoln;" but, this work having been out of print for a number of years, he was persuaded to undertake the task of preparing a new, enlarged, and corrected edition. Having continued the work of collection and arrangement from the period of his first publication, and having obtained a large amount of curious miscellaneous information relative to the district during a residence of some years in the United States, he has been enabled to bring together a mass of interesting historical, topographical, and antiquarian lore which must delight the heart of every truly patriotic inhabitant of the district to which it relates. For, let the Times declaim as it may against provincialism, and in favour of the cultivation of cosmopolitanism, the people of England will always retain a strong and deep attachment to the town or district in which they were born, will always take a peculiar interest in all that relates to the welfare and renown of that place, however small, and will always, we trust, give a hearty welcome to a book like the one before us, in which the noteworthy events in the history of a town are so well recorded.

To those who are not much acquainted with the ancient history of Boston it may seem strange that a town which appears to have been in existence centuries before the Norman Conquest should contain so small a number of inhabitants at the present day. On consulting Mr. Thompson's work, however, they will find that Boston was a place of great commercial importance long before Liverpool had come into existence as a seaport. So far back as the reign of King John, it appears, from a return of the sums paid by the principal ports in the kingdom on account of the Quinzisme, a tax of one-fifteenth of the movable goods of all merchants, that Boston ranked next to London in the amount of its contribution. Hull and Newcastle together did not pay as much to the revenue in 1206 as Boston did. At the end of the thirteenth century the duties paid by Boston exceeded those of London for a period of ten years. The rank which it then held was owing to its favourable geographical position; the trade of England in those days being chiefly with Holland, Flanders, and France—countries lying eastward of England. Let it be remembered also that Boston was "situated at the mouth of a river navigable to Lincoln for boats of considerable size, and thence by the Fossdyke, communicating with the Trent and the numerous tributary streams. It may be said that Boston was the outlet into which the surplus produce of sixteen or eighteen of the counties of England would naturally flow, and where the foreign articles consumed by the inhabitants of those counties would as naturally arrive for sale and distribution." Those who wish to know what causes led to the decline of its commercial importance, and the circumstances to which it owes its present prosperity, will find them amply related by Mr. Thompson.

Our limited space forbids our giving any account of the interesting information relating to the antiquities of the town and district; but we shall probably take an opportunity of extracting some of the most curious items as occasion offers.

PEN AND PENCIL PICTURES. By THOMAS HOOD. Hurst and Blackett.

Somebody once had this whimsical notion—was it "Hood's own," or Sydney Smith's, or Thomas Ingoldsby's, we don't precisely recollect—that the office of your modern reviewer was perhaps the best fulfilled by cutting the leaves and smelling the paper-knife. Here, however, is a book that hackneyed critics even will read with unflagging interest, or we are very much mistaken, from titlepage to "finis." It is the maiden work of Tom Hood the younger, and, as such, it commands from one and all affectionate greeting. The author-artist is a student of Pembroke College, Oxford, but just of age, and destined, we believe, to "enter life" in the clerical profession.

The kindliest welcome that can be given is his right, his heritage. It is such, in his capacity as the only son of that dear friend of us all the charming poet, the unrivalled humourist—who "sleeps well," "after life's fitful fever," under the grass of Kensal-green, in that secluded corner of the national cemetery henceforth classical by reason of the tasteful monument there erected "in memory of Thomas Hood," by a people's love, evidenced through a public and very miscellaneous subscription. How tenderly, we may be sure, the large and gentle heart of that dead father would have yearned, had fate been spared until now, over the forthcoming of this, the first literary offspring of the heir to his name! His affection for this child of many hopes do we not all know how deep it was, how earnest it was, how full of sweet and eloquent tenderness? Remember, in proof of it all, those exquisite stanzas, "To a child embracing its mother"—that child the author of this volume; and those three graceful sonnets upon a kindred theme (the same child "sleeping") —the last of which, commencing in sadness, thus closes with a pun:—

> Gladly turning from the world's annoy
> I gaze upon little pattern thee,
> And bless internally the merry boy
> Who makes a son-shine in a shady place!

The unmistakable son of his father does Tom Hood the younger prove himself repeatedly in the work before us. Witness his ludicrous description of the dress of Panurgus Pebbles:—

> "Look at his dwess!" drawled the languid Parker. "One would think he—aw—dwessed himself with a knife and fawk aw. When he was at school he always had five patches about his person: two aw—that he knelt on; two aw—that he leant on, and one—aw—that he sat on aw!"

By way of contrast we quote from an Apologue on Angels:—

> There is one angel that thou may st remember about thy cradle, singing low sweet songs to thee. Nay, at that angel's knee didst thou, grown older, lisp thy first prayer; and now that angel whispers to thy heart, "This is well," or "This is ill done." Men call it conscience; but when that angel walked visibly on earth, thy baby lips used to call it "Mother."

And there are yet other angels who guard thy steps through life—some visible, of this world—some invisible, of the other world; and one thou callest "Father;" others "Sisters," "Brethren," "Friends"—all angels.

And behold there is still another angel, with clear, earnest, soft eyes, and long dark locks, that make a calm night around your brow when that angel bends over you to kiss you; and a sweet low voice, and a light fairy form and step—so light that you know she flies sometimes—she cannot walk, so silently and swiftly. And that angel's voice is sweeter even than the voice of Conscience. And she is a visible angel—and sometimes then called it "Love;" but in thy later years it hath a dearer name—"Beloved on earth—" Wife," and that angel ever dwelleth with thee and blesseth thee.

But that dearest angel is the light and blessing of thy life, and in thy youth thou scarcest that fergot-me-nots first blossomed at her feet; but afterwards, in thy later thoughts, she is crowned with pansies.

And when thou kneelest down thou prayest God—oh! how earnestly—that that angel may tarry long with thee on earth; that no fault of thine may cause that she fade away, and leave thee for that bright home in heaven from which thou knowest so well she came down to be the life of thy life.

So pray ever, and long may thine angel abide with thee!

Our young author's verses are graceful enough to disarm criticism; nor are they deficient in feeling, proof of which is given in the following, from his Address to the Reader:

And if sought a moment's leave you to weeping,
In reading the volume o'er,
The writer's tears—believe me—
Have dropt on the page before.

And if you are moved to smiling,
When a merry jest you note,
The writer's heart—believe me—
Was smiling too when he wrote.

Another gay example of his hereditary whimsicality may be found in this fantastic description of his chief comic hero, P. Pebbles—a character lightly touched off with a pen of most agreeable facetiousness—

A jack of all trades, and master of none, was Panurgus Pepples: from the birdseye range of boyhood to the mental pains of man's estate, his shallow versatility was his bane; from the first kick and crow in long clothes to the silent rigidity in the shroud, his life, a patchwork harlequin, was ever slapping and flopping him.

Fire catches hold of a sly fellow; he must have got them of some Roman Peter Schlemils. Poor fellows, how I pity them!

Well, besides one's own shadow, there's that of the arm-chair. Look up on the ceiling—there it is. It looks like a little merry old man with his hands on his knees; look how he nods his wicked old head (and, I dare say, winks, only we can't see it) at that prim young lady with the curious head-dress (she's the little table, with the coffee-pot and lamp on it). And the shadow of the coal-scuttle is something between a frog, a dog, and a cow's head. There they are, flickering and bobbing on the wall growing faint and then bright again all of a sudden, when Fire catches hold of a sly coal in the corner of the grate, and begins to chuckle and splutter over it. Besides affording us this shadowy company (I was going to say shady company, but the expression on a little more consideration is very exceptionable), there's Fire; though he has his thoughtful moments, too, when he winks and puts out little globules of gaseous coal, like a baby blowing bubbles with its little fat mouth.

If he gets hold of wood he makes a fine to-do: he whistles, and crackles, and throws out sparks, and is not altogether such pleasant company as he is when he has coals: though even then, if he finds a bit of slate or stone among them, he spects it summarily with a loud exclamation. He's very pleasant when he gets red and warm, and shoots out his queer-shaped flames, and when the curious smoke goes winding round the chimney making faces and rings and all sorts of shapes. He's facetious, too, for sometimes when he sees you with your pipe, he begins too, and puffs out a little jet of thick, white smoke, and then he changes it and sends it with a fiercer "puff" into a jet of bright gas, bringing to our recollection the greengrocers in Tottenham-court-road. If left unnoticed he often takes refuge in smoke (like ill-used bachelors), and departs by the chimney leaving the cinders to tinkle his knell.

Enough—the book is a capital first venture. As the production of a young collegiate student, it is, we cannot but think, remarkable. As a maiden work, embiazoned in its title with a great name, it yields (and surely it is much to say so?) no disappointment. As a Christmas offering made to the reading public by the only son of dear Tom Hood, it commands, we repeat, a glad and eager acceptance—an acceptance, we are rejoiced to know, it is now very rapidly obtaining. The portrait of Mr. Hood is from a photograph recently taken by his friend Mr John Watkins, of Parliament-street.

A GLANCE AT THE ZOOLOGICAL REPRESENTATIONS ON THE NINEVEH BAS-RELIEFS

To wander through the galleries and vaults of the British Museum appropriated to the sculptured antiquities brought from the once glorious but now entombed city of Nineveh is an intellectual luxury. After the first feelings of bewilderment are over, and the mind settles down to the task of scrutiny, it is then that we begin to realise the full value of the objects around us. We feel that we are thrown back into times of remote antiquity—that a mysterious page in the history of nations is spread before us. Many are its revelations, some are patent to every reflective observer, others are to be deciphered only by laborious study. In due time we begin to grow familiar with the kings and their attendants, with the people and their habits, with their wars and triumphs, with their splendour and barbarity. We are soon constrained to acknowledge that, however elevated in the arts or powerful as a nation the Assyrians may have been, they were a cruel people—cruel in their wars, cruel to the vanquished, cruel to the wild animals of the chase. They delighted in bloodshed; their conquests were followed by wholesale slaughter, and the chase, evidently a royal pastime, was merely a battue.

We are not, however, about to attempt an analysis of any series of slabs in regular order; on the contrary, our present object is to pick out certain points of zoological interest which we begin to realise at present, and a few brief comments upon them. It must be remembered that these slabs, covered over with sculptured figures, are not of one age or period of time, but of successive epochs, the most recent of which are of remote antiquity. Three thousand years have passed since the sculptor's hand plied the "chisel's art" upon their surface. They open to our contemplation the events of a succession of dynasties from Derceto (1250 B.C.) to the son of Asshurakpal (who reigned about 630 B.C.) They record the sieges of towns, the combats of warriors, the triumphs of kings, the processions of the victors, the chains and fetters of the vanquished. But besides these subjects of high interest to the explorer of the history of nations passed away, to the learned antiquary they unfold to our inspection a portfolio of zoological drawings ad naturam, executed by artists of great eminence in their day and generation, who evidently studied their subject, and engaged upon their work with energy. Let us turn from kings and satraps, the conquerors and the conquered, to those not less interesting subjects. How numerous are the tableaux of lions and lion-hunts, how spirited and truthful are those chiselled lithoglyphs! Lions are before us in every attitude. Here we behold them in combat; here in movable dens or cages, from which they are about to issue forth. These cages are composed of iron bars or stouks of wood, and much resemble in form a square rat-trap, having in front at the top a small cage-like tower, of the same material, for the security of the man whose office it is to raise up the portcullis for the exit of the ferocious beast, which is delineated in the act of creeping forth, with a snarl and glaring eyes, aware of the enemies which he has to encounter. He is in the centre of a spacious arena inclosed by a wall—a living wall—consisting of men with interlocked shields in close array, each with an uplifted spear in his right hand ready to strike and drive the animal back into the open space, where the monarch and his nobles wheel around in their chariots launching their arrows at the half-terrified, half-infuriated animal. Not always were the hunters unscathed: in one slab a led horse has the lion fastened upon his haunches by teeth and talons; in another the lion is wrenching the chariot wheel in his agony and despair. One hunt presents us with four lions and two lionesses dead or dying, transfixed with numerous arrows or javelins, in the arena. Wonderful is the picture. The attitudes of the animals are varied in the extreme: in some the relaxed limbs show that death has ended their torments; in others the agony is displayed in the contortion of the face and limbs, while a torrent of blood is vomited from the open mouths, and pours from the wounds made by the weapons, which often constately transfix the body. Painful are the pictures of lions struck through the muscles and spinal column of the loins; the lower limbs deprived of power are dragging along the ground, while the head and shoulders are erect, every lineament of the countenance exhibiting the intensity of despairing rage. The annexed cut represents a lioness whose hinder limbs are paralysed by an arrow through the backbone.

In some instances we have the representation of a single combat. A fragmental slab shows a warrior grasping the tail of a lion, probably wounded, which appears to be turning round on the defensive; but this part of the slab is defective. On another slab we see a King grasping a rampant lion by the throat, and passing his sword through the animal's chest, while, on a third slab, the King contends with a lion in his spear, which he is driving down its throat. It was not, however, always that lions were brought in cages (like a bagged fox or a carted deer) to the man-walled arena: they were also hunted on the open plain, roused up by men and dogs from their lair. Many are the representations of lions baited by dogs—and such dogs! terrible creatures! but of these we shall speak hereafter. These dogs not only brought the lion to bay, but grappled with him, as the charioteers with their bows dashed up to their assistance. We may observe, en passant, that the Assyrian bow was of a very peculiar shape, strung with a thick string, and fitted with long and almost javelin-like arrows. A slab demonstrates the strength of the bow by the delineation of two men employed in stringing it. The string is of equal length from the ground to the warrior's shoulder. We are speaking of the recently-received slabs not as yet publicly exhibited.

Lion-hunting was evidently a passion amongst the ancient Assyrians, and as troops of captive enemies were led in procession to the foot of the conqueror, so were the bodies of the lions slaughtered by the hand of the monarch (flattered, no doubt, as to the number which fell beneath his weapons); for on one slab we see a procession of men carrying slain lions on their shoulders; each lion being supported by several men. The outline of the lions is most artistic.

There is one slab of peculiar interest connected with lions. It represents a sort of fortress, composed of many embattled towers of various height, rising up on the back like a crest. Above them, on the slow and the swift camel is very interesting, for the two breeds are preserved to the present day. The pace of the slow-going camel used for burden is about three miles an hour, regular as clockwork, the load of each animal being between four and five hundredweight. Such are the camels of which long files or caravans still cross the desert as they did of yore, bearing their loads of merchandise; and such is the fleet dromedary, the Maharee or El Heiris of the Arabian desert, of which the Arab thus speaks in figurative language, "When thou shalt meet a Heiris, and say to the rider 'Peace be between us,' ere he shall have answered 'There is peace between us,' he will be far off and nearly out of sight, for his swiftness is like the wind." It is said that a journey of seventy or even a hundred miles in the twenty-four hours, and continued for several successive days at the same ratio, is by no means an unusual rate of travelling. The swift Heiris is still used for the conveyance of messengers, as it was in the time when "Mordecai sent letters by post on horseback, and riders on mules, camels, and young dromedaries." It is also at the present time employed in desultory warfare in the desert; that it was so anciently is well known, for we read of "four hundred young men that rode on camels," which escaped the sword of David. Romanzarie, when in Egypt, had a dromedary corps, each animal carrying two soldiers.

WILD ASS TAKEN IN A LASSO.

Noble was the breed of horses among the Assyrians, and most characteristic are the delineations of these high-blood animals, which the slabs present to our inspection in great abundance. Among the nations of antiquity the horse was not commonly used for servile drudgery—it was employed as an arm of war; it drew the light chariots of the monarch or his leaders in battle, or in the pursuit of the lion and other animals of the chase; or it carried warriors armed either with the spear, or the bow; or it swelled the pageant of a triumphal procession. It was adorned with embroidered trappings, with rosettes, fringes, tassels, and plumes. Horsemen and charioteers constituted an important part of the Assyrian army. 'Horsemen,' says Mr Layard, "are seen in the most ancient sculptures of Nimroud, and I have already mentioned that disciplined bodies of cavalry were represented in the bas-reliefs of Kouyunjik." We learn from the Book of

CHETAH, OR HUNTING LEOPARD

Judith that Holofernes had 12,000 archers on horseback. By the side of the King a horse richly caparisoned, apparently for his use—perhaps to enable him to fly, should his chariot-horses be killed—is frequently seen, led by a warrior, and following his chariot.

The same writer, after observing that the horses of the Assyrians, as far as we can judge from the sculptures, were well formed, and apparently, of noble blood, adds:—"It has been doubted whether the breed for which Mesopotamia and the neighbouring deserts of Arabia are now celebrated, existed in the same vast plains at a remote period, or whether it was introduced shortly after the Mahometan conquest."

In our opinion the original country of the horse extends over the central regions of Asia, whence, in a domestic state, it passed into South-Western Asia, and thence, by an influx of conquering nomadic hordes (Hyksos Scythians or Shepherd Kings) into Egypt.

It may be remembered that, in the year B.C. 1920, Abraham was driven by famine into Egypt; the then reigning Pharaoh possessed sheep, oxen, camels, and asses in abundance; but the horse is not mentioned. About 205 years later, when Joseph was viceroy in Egypt, we not only read of his riding in the second chariot, but of his accepting horses in exchange for corn from the Royal granary. And at a subsequent period the Israelites, on their "exodus," were pursued by six hundred chosen chariots, besides horsemen. At a still later period the Hebrews, though debarred by the Mosaic injunctions from "multiplying horses," abundant in the surrounding territories tenanted by hostile nations, broke in process of time through the law, and added cavalry and chariots to their army, and to the "apparatus" of royalty. "Horses were offered to the Jews by the Assyrian King as an acceptable present (See 2 Kings, xviii 23); and on the statistical tablet of Karnak they are mentioned among the objects of tribute brought by the people of Naharaina (Mesopotamia) and the neighbouring countries to the Egyptians. The Jews carried on a trade with Egypt in horses (see 1. Kings, x. 28, 29): the Egyptians received their stock from Mesopotamia. With respect to the modern Arabian horse, we may observe that it was not cultivated till after the time of

BABOON ON THE SHOULDERS OF A SHOWMAN.

Mahomet, who wrote in its praise. No doubt it is a descendant of the old Assyrian race, such as is described in that celebrated passage of the Book of Job, the grandeur of which no classic poet has equalled. We might dilate to a great extent upon this subject, in which the history of the horse is blended with that of man. But we must draw in the reins, though an open course is before us. We may, however, direct our readers to the fourth chapter of the "History of the Horse," by W. C. L. Martin (Knight and Co.), in which those interested on such a topic may find some observations worthy of their consideration.

With respect to the mule little need be said—it was evidently used as a beast of burden, and was a powerful animal, probably the offspring of the wild ass and Assyrian mare. The subjoined cut will give an idea of its fine form and proportions. It is represented carrying nets to the hunting-field

SHEEP. SPIRAL-HORNED GOATS.

Among smaller quadrupeds we notice the hare, of which we engrave one held by the hind legs in the hand of a sportsman. It is probably the Lepus Ægyptiacus, smaller than our common European species.

Let us now turn to the species of the feathered tribe which these bas-reliefs represent. The ostrich is represented incised on the robe of a eunuch, and, always in connection with scenes of battle and slaughter, is the vulture conspicuous. On one slab, evidently representing the capitulation of a city, we behold three vultures—two on the wing and one feasting on the body of a slain warrior. The slab is marked 15 b. The birds, we may observe, are more conventionally drawn than the quadrupeds, and do not appear to have been so diligently studied by the artists—who, however, fail both in their figures of the elephant, and the apes or monkeys. On another slab in the gallery, representing a triumphal return after some devastating inroad, a vulture is seen towering aloft, carrying in its talons the head of one of the slain. A conflict is depicted on another bas-relief, where, over the combatants a vulture soars in the air, dragging in his claws the entrails of one of the fallen heroes, which he has torn, perchance, from the yet quivering body. As we surveyed this bas-relief we involuntarily uttered to ourselves a line in Ovid, which the revolting picture recalled to memory

Unguibus et rostro, tardus trahit ilia vultur.

(With talons and with beak the sluggish vulture trails forth the inward parts.)

From the earliest times the vultures have been notorious for their attendance on the battlefield. "Wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." (Matthew xxiv., 28.) For eagles read vultures. Homer alludes to the united feast of vultures and wild dogs on the bodies of the slain in battle; and in fact the ancient classic writings teem with passages illustrative of such scenes of warfare as these slabs delineate, in which the vulture plays a conspicuous part.

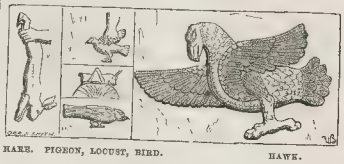
Per auras longè ducuntur odore volucri cadaveribus.—LUCRETIUS.

The vulture thus depicted appears to be the griffon (Vultur fulvus).

Besides the vulture we have the pigeon and the swallow. The annexed cuts are representations of these birds, as they are delineated on various slabs —

Turning from land scenes to representations of rivers, or the margin of the sea—on which are war-galleys, boats, and men swimming—we see fish in abundance, some short and scaled, others long and eel-like, together with crabs, tortoises, and reptiles. To determine the species would be an almost useless attempt, for it is evident that the artist aimed rather at the indication of water than of any species of the finny tribe which might tenant it—these being merely adjuncts to certify to the spectator its distinction from the land.



HARE. PIGEON, LOCUST, BIRD. HAWK.

Among insects we observe the locust.

So far then, irrespective of chronological arrangement, have we passed over in zoological review the recovered relics of buried Nineveh. We confess to the meagreness of our details; but we have done as much as possible within the limited space allotted to us. We merely give rough notes en passant—nothing more.

The following are the sources whence the Illustrations have been derived:—

Lioness, from a slab discovered by Mr. H. Rassam, and now in the vaults of the British Museum. See also Engraving in ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for May 24th, 1856

Wild Ass, from a slab in the British Museum, discovered by Mr. Loftus. It is represented taken in a lasso.

Elephant; Chetah, or Hunting Leopard; Rhinoceros, or Straight-horned Ox, from the Nimroud obelisk in the British Museum, discovered by Mr. Layard. The chetah is depicted on the Nimroud obelisk attacking a stag or gazelle. This latter animal is seen finely portrayed in several successive slabs in Asshurbanipal Palace.

Goats and Sheep, Monkey, Eagle, Ostrich; Human-headed Winged Lion and Eagle-headed Human Figure, engraved on a eunuch's robe, from slabs found at Nimroud by Mr. Layard. The eagle-headed figure is apparently castigating the winged lion. The tail of the lion shows the claw at the extremity, which is more clearly represented on the Nimroud Sculptures.

CRAB. FISH. OSTRICH. FABULOUS MONSTER.

Wild Pig and Young, Crab, Fish, from Kouyunjik Gallery in the British Museum. A smaller description of fish is shown on slab engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for August 16, 1856. (Crabs are caught in the River Khauser which runs by the mounds of Kouyunjik and Khorsabbad.)

Camel, from one of Mr. Boutcher's sketches—the original sculpture was lost in the Tigris.

Mule, from a slab in the British Museum, discovered by Mr. Loftus. It is represented going to the hunting-ground, carrying a portion of a net inclosure.

Gazelle, Stag, Dogs, Hare, Hawk, from slabs in the British Museum, discovered by Mr. Loftus.

Small Bird, from a fragment in Mr Boutcher's possession.

Fabulous Monster, from a slab found by Mr. Loftus. This slab formed one of the entrance-portals. The animal had lion's legs.

EAGLE-HEADED HUMAN FIGURE. HUMAN-HEADED WINGED LION.

We subjoin a list of the Illustrations of the Nineveh Zoology already engraved in our Journal—the whole of which were found in the Palace of Asshurbanipal, at Kouyunjik.

Horse, given in ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for January 19th, 1856; Lion, May 24th, 1856, and January 19th, 1856; Cows, &c., January 19th, 1856.

Lion-headed human-bodied griffin-footed Monster is shown on the good and evil genii slab in ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for Nov. 15, 1856.

THE SOULAGE COLLECTION.

BRONZES, FURNITURE, AND ENAMELS.

In a former article we noticed the pottery of this collection; the catalogue of the bronzes and furniture being now completed, we notice a few of the most remarkable works in this department.

No. 334. A pair of bronze firedogs of extraordinary beauty, renaissance design, with the arms of the Venetian Barbarigo family, the date given is 1570—that is to say, when Paul Veronese was in the zenith of his power. One of the figures represents a man with a dog; the other, a woman with a hand mirror: the chase and the toilet being the occupation of cavalier and dame. There is another lot of four fender-irons of much the same period. These utensils are in wrought iron, beautifully ornamented, and surmounted by bronze satyrs. The English spectator accustomed to our coal fires and pokers will admire the different devices for manipulating faggots.

No. 462 is a magnificent chimneypiece in carved stone of the beginning of the fifteenth century. Projecting corbels designed with extraordinary freedom and elegance support the chimney cover or garaffone as the Italians used to call it. All around this canopy is a strikingly-beautiful frieze in altissimo relevo, representing hunting scenes This exceedingly curious and elegant piece was brought from the palace of the Counts Petinelli, at Padua.

No. 690 is a walnut-wood cabinet of the middle of the sixteenth century, one of the most elegant specimens of French renaissance work which we have seen. It is said to be the work of Bachelier, of Toulouse, who is reported to have studied in Italy and to have been a pupil of Michael Angelo. The relievo in the centre division represents David with the head of Goliath. The rest of this fine piece is ornamented with sphinxes, niches, and statuettes, in the boldest Italian style. The Dutch and German cabinets of the seventeenth century have an inelegant rudeness of design compared with such a work as this.

No. 689 is a metallic mirror in a carved case or frame of the Italian school. The catalogue attributes this piece to Benvenuto Cellini, in consequence of its resemblance to the marble pedestal of the statue of Perseus in Florence. In the centre the metallic plate is covered by a sunk sliding panel, which is carved so as to represent a female profile like an antique cameo. The framework is of a bold and elegant design, like renaissance architecture.

No. 331 is a salver and gilt bronze of Venetian engraved work, and a ewer to match. These are very remarkable and very beautiful pieces, in consequence of being so completely filled up by the engraving. They may be called Italian editions of that art of basin engraving in which the Persians were such adepts, but with different designs. This represents the attack and defence of fortified places, and is ornamented with much scrollwork. There are many figures of men and horses on the ewer, which is of an antique shape.

The enamelled work of this collection is curious and valuable. No. 437 is a fine piece of enamelled sculpture of Luca della Robbia-ware. The catalogue states that, although it is from the fabbrica of Luca della Robbia, it is, probably, by Andrea or one of his sons, dating after 1500. The curious carved frame, although of ancient Italian work, is of a later date than the piece itself. No. 438, "The Adoration of the Kings," a fine work, is of an earlier period.

The Limousin enamels of France are in this collection very well represented, and are the more valuable from their extreme rarity and the enormous prices now given for them by fanatical or patriotic French collectors. Soulage died not very far from Limoges, this may account for the richness of the collection. No. 317. "Plapne, a Portrait of Charles Tiercelin. Seigneur de la Roche Dumaine en Poitou, Chancelier de France." This is the work of Leonard Limosin, one of the ablest artists of the best period of this ware. Another of these artists of the best period was Jean Courtois, who has given scenes from the history of Joseph well worthy of examination, such as Nos. 326 and 327. We apprehend that this collection of Limousin enamels will, from its beauty, rarity, and historical celebrity, prove to be one of the most interesting portions of this cabinet of curiosities—comprising so many objects which the skill and ingenuity of the workers of the period of the Revival produced to gratify the taste or the vanity of the opulent.

THE "REBECCA" AND "BARBARIGO," AT THE PHOTOGRAPHIC ASSOCIATION, 123, REGENT-STREET

These pictures have been painted by a Pole, resident in Florence, who is a member of the Academy of the Fine Arts there. They are now on sale. They are fair specimens of the modern school of Italy, with which many of our readers are no doubt acquainted. The Doge, with a noble and expressive countenance, is represented haranguing the Venetians against the French, then invading Italy, under Charles VIII. "Rebecca" is, we think, a more interesting subject, for the other picture has no background which recalls either the architecture or manners of Venice in the fifteenth century. In the case of "Rebecca" we have a landscape and still life reminding us of Syria and Mesopotamia. The expression of "Rebecca" is pleasing, and the handling is altogether larger than in the other picture.

In the same establishment we found a newly-executed photographic portrait of the Duke of Cambridge for the Queen, which in resemblance cannot be surpassed. We also saw at this Association several specimens of the new process of photography on ivory, which admit of being coloured with a delicacy which reminds us of hand miniature. In face, miniature-painters, except those of the highest class, seem now to be in as bad a predicament as the copyists after the invention of printing, or the handloom weavers after the introduction of steam power

A FRENCH ARTEMISIA.—The adjourned cause of Madame Adoum against Colonel Dubost, in which she claimed 900 francs damages for his refusal to complete his marriage and live with her, came on before the Civil Tribunal of the seine for judgment last week The Court gave a verdict for the defendant, and condemned Madame Adoum to pay the costs of the proceedings. The public minister was more severe upon the lady than even the counsel for the defence He called her an Artemisia, unworthy of any sympathy; and expressed an opinion that if she, who two months after the death of her first husband was ready to exchange her mourning attire for bridal roues, had suffered any damage, it was only such as resulted from the scandal of the action which she had brought.

THE ALEXANDRE HARMONIUM AT SIX GUINEAS.

ALEXANDRE and SON have made this Harmonium at the lowest price possible, to bring the instrument within the means of all classes. It is in an Oak Case, with Four Octaves, is alike calculated for Private Rooms and for Chapels, and is INDISPENSABLE TO THE SCHOOL-ROOM.

The Six-Guinea Harmonium will be taken in exchange for any of the more expensive descriptions, without any distinction.

Alexandre and Son obtained the Sole Medal of Honour at the Great Exhibition at Paris, 1855. Their Harmoniums have been pronounced the best by Rossini, Auber, Adam, Thalberg, Lizst, &c., and by the Professors of the Conservatoire de Paris.

The more expensive Harmoniums range from 10 to 55 guineas. These are brought to the greatest perfection of tone, and are equally adapted to the

CHURCH OR DRAWING-ROOM,

ACCOMPANIMENT TO THE VOICE OR PIANOFORTE.

Messrs. Chappell have just received a number of Alexandre's celebrated

which combine the excellence of both instruments. The two can be used in combination by the same performer, or each instrument is perfect in itself. Price From 60 to 150 guineas.

An Immense Stock of

PIANOFORTES BY THE BEST MAKERS,

from Twenty Guineas upwards, which can be thoroughly recommended and warranted.

Messrs. Chappell and Co. have just opened a number of

enabling the purchaser to select a Pianoforte or Harmonium from the largest Stock in London, and to try the merits of the various makers side by side.

Full descriptive Lists of Harmoniums and of Pianofortes will be sent on application to

50, NEW BOND-STREET; AND 13, GEORGE-STREET, HANOVER-SQUARE.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANO. FORTE, price Fifty Guineas.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary Cottage Pianoforte) Three Strings and the full-toned Grand compass of Seven Octaves. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bicknell Grand. The case is of the most elegant Gothic design, combining the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to ensure its standing well in time. Chappell and Co. especially invite the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the Foreign Model, feeling assured that no Pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase.—50, New Bond-street, London.

HARMONIUMS.—CRAMER, BEALE, and CO are agents for ALEXANDRE'S NEW PATENT MODEL 201, Regent-street.

RENEWED PEACE.

THE star of England is once more in the ascendant. There was a time, not very remote, when it seemed to be obscured by the inexperience or the incapacity of our officials; by the lukewarmness of our Government in carrying on a struggle, on the success of which the people had set their hearts; and when the capture of the Malakoff by the French afforded a pretext to all who were jealous of or hostile to our influence in Europe, to assert that our power was on the wane, and that our glory had long since reached its culmination. But that day has passed. Whatever may have been thought or desired a year ago, it is now patent to the world that Great Britain was never stronger or more influential than she is now; that the burden of war which pressed on other empires and states with intolerable severity was scarcely felt in this richer and more vigorous nation; and that any efforts, however stupendous, which the people and the Government may have made in past times to maintain the equilibrium of Europe and their own high position in the councils of the world would by no means overtax their energies at the present time, but might be easily exceeded at the first sound of danger, or the first promptings of duty.

To the British Government, Press, and People, and to the knowledge that there were a fine army and a still finer navy in reserve to back their high pretensions, the result is entirely owing. When the preliminaries of peace were signed in March, 1856, the people almost unanimously felt that terms by far too merciful and too favourable had been accorded to the ambitious Power which, for its own selfish purposes, had thrown Europe into confusion. The press, with still greater unanimity, gave expression to the popular feeling; and when it was found that Russia, emboldened by the leniency that had been shown her, endeavoured to take advantage of her own wrong, and retain, in spite of the obvious intentions of the framers of the Treaty, two points of the Turkish dominions which would have enabled her to dominate both in the Euxine and on the Danube, Lord Palmerston, with equal courage and sagacity, threw himself upon the English people, and determined, even though England should fight the battle single-handed, to compel Russia to the strict and equitable observance of the contract which was the sole result of a two years' conflict.

Let Lord Palmerston have the credit of this boldness, and of the success which rewarded it. He did not miscalculate the force of honesty of purpose, nor rely in vain upon the moral sentiment of his countrymen to support him in a wise and dignified policy. The difficulties in his path were many and formidable. France had reaped glory enough in the war, and looked with the gloomiest apprehensions on the possibility of its renewal. The Emperor had either pledged himself to support the Russian interpretation of the Treaty, or considered the possession of Bolgrad and the Isle of Serpents a matter of too little importance to be worth a struggle. Sardinia sided with France as her nearest neighbour and most essential ally. Turkey was either too helpless to urge her wishes with effect, or her effete Administration was too indifferent to the future to care for anything but present repose, and lay at the command of the Powers which had aided her to adjourn sine die the question of her dismemberment. Austria was estranged and offended; and her Emperor and Ministers were mistrustful of the English people and of English statesmen, and more especially of Lord Palmerston, whose name to them was all but synonymous with encouragement to rebellion in Hungary and Lombardy. Where, then, was Lord Palmerston to look for support out of his own country? Nowhere but in France, and in France the needful support was not immediately rendered. But the statesmen of Austria saw the opportunity, and took advantage of it. If Russia retained the mouths of the Danube, the horrors of the next war, come when it might, would fall upon Austria rather than upon Turkey. Russia owed the Austrians a debt of revenge which the possession of Bolgrad and the Isle of Serpents would help her to discharge. For once Austria was bold, and she has reaped her reward. She forgot the Hungarian grievance, and the sympathies of the English press, people, and Government with the Italians, and united herself cordially with Lord Palmerston in wresting justice from Russia, even though a renewal of the war might have been the result. Russia declined the chances of the struggle. Foiled on the battle-field by the united forces of Great Britain and France, she was foiled a second time on the field of diplomacy by the united efforts of Great Britain and Austria. The result is the Peace of 1857, which is a more satisfactory, and therefore a more stable, peace than that of 1856, because it is unaccompanied by the triumph of chicanery and cheating; and because it has inflicted upon Russia a moral defeat which will do her more damage than the loss of Sebastopol. She may rebuild a broken fortress, but she can never wipe from the remembrances of living men or from the page of history, the fact that she attempted to regain by fraud what she had lost by the hazard of war; and that she was foiled by the force of honesty as completely as she had previously been foiled by the force of arms. So may it ever be with the wrong-doer, both among nations and among individuals!

PLAN OF THE CITY OF CANTON.

BOMBARDMENT OF CANTON: THE SUBURBS ON FIRE.—FROM A SKETCH BY AN OFFICER ENGAGED IN THE OPERATIONS.—(SEE PAGE 38.)

And while this cloud has blown from the horizon, another, which threatened storm, has likewise passed away. Means have been discovered to save the not very valuable dignity of the King of Prussia, without doing violence to the rights or to the feelings of the Swiss people—a matter of infinitely more serious concern to every body in Europe. The question of Neufchâtel and its sovereignty has been finally disposed of, and there is an end to all apprehension in that quarter. But, grateful as the nations must be for the removal of one source of disquietude, it behoves the Governments of Europe, ere they make too sure of the peace which seems dawning upon them, to consider carefully whether the danger is at an end elsewhere. No one suspected a few months ago that any question relative to Switzerland would arise to disturb the peace of the world; and there may be many agencies, both popular and dynastic, at work in Europe, which may quite as unexpectedly imperil the new-born peace at which all good men are now rejoicing. At present the most obvious danger is in Italy; and, unfortunately, the good understanding which we have so lately re-established with Austria is not likely to produce any durable results. If the Italians would be satisfied with reforms, and with a moderate degree of constitutional liberty, our influence might be favourably exerted with Austria in furtherance of such objects. But the Italians naturally desire independence; and Austria is not likely to grant it to them unless at the sword's point. This is the existing danger of Europe, and it will, we fear, continue to be a danger for a long time. The fire smoulders, and will one day break out. The Powers of Europe should look to it, now that their hands are free, or there may yet come a conflagration which may involve them all.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

THE NEUFCHATEL QUESTION.

The Patrie announces that the King of Prussia had agreed to have recourse to the good offices proposed by France as a basis for the definitive arrangement of the differences between that Power and Switzerland. By this arrangement His Prussian Majesty would, it is said, renounce for the present the exercise of his rights of sovereignty, the formal acknowledgment of his titles as private property to the castles of Neufchâtel and Valengin, as well as the domains appertaining to them. The revenues of the ex-domains, amounting to some 18,000 or 20,000 thalers, to be assigned in part to the Prince at Neufchâtel itself. The Prussian flag to be hoisted on the two castles.

A telegraphic despatch from Berne, dated January 13 states that the Message of the Federal Council to the Federal Assembly proposes to declare that the Note remains open with regard to the eight Swiss prisoners at Neufchâtel, and to decree their liberation, on condition of their leaving the territory of the Helvetic Confederation until after the definitive conclusion of the arrangement. The same document proposes to suspend the armaments, and to send the troops to their homes. The message announces that the Ministers of Austria and Russia at Berne have communicated to the Federal Council notes in conformity with those of France and England.

The discussion of the proposition by the Federal Assembly was postponed till the 15th, the day on which the delay fixed by Prussia for the military movement expired. The Berlin and Paris Ministerial papers assert positively that nothing has been done which can in the slightest affect the honour of Prussia.

The New Prussian Gazette of Tuesday last positively denies that Prussia has contracted any other engagement than that of entering into equal negotiations on the affair of Neufchâtel as soon as the prisoners shall have been set at liberty unconditionally. It adds, that no great Power has requested any other promise.

THE ENGLISH FLEET IN THE BLACK SEA.

The fleet under Lord Lyons had received news of its eventual departure when the Egyptus left Constantinople, but Lord Lyons had also been informed that he would have to remain in the Black Sea as long as the Austrians were in the Principalities. The Admiral has accordingly sent to Malta for provisions.

THE WAR WITH PERSIA.

By the Hydaspes which arrived at Marseilles on Tuesday, we have to learn of but little importance with us. The accounts from the seat of war, even through the channel are very meagre. The English fleet, the Persian and the shipping on their operations, in order to avoid their vessels from the severe cold.

The latest news of the progress of preparations for defence, notwithstanding the penury of the treasury and the want of resolve. A Persian war-vessel has taken possession of all the arms attached to the residence of the Shah. The Russian Minister on the Caspian Sea has already left for Persia. The Persian Islands allege that treaties of peace exist between Persia and Russia. The Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, charged with the delivery of the ultimatum of Russia to the Persian Government, has left for Teheran. Such orders have been given to the Persian troops to march under the command of the Shah in person, in all the forts attached to the residence of the Shah. The Russian Minister on the Caspian Sea has already left for Persia. The Persian Islands allege that treaties of peace exist between Persia and Russia. The Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, charged with the delivery of the ultimatum of Russia to the Persian Government, has left for Teheran. Such orders have been given to the Persian troops to march under the command of the Shah in person, in all the forts attached to the residence of the Shah.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

The advices from China by the last Overland Mail are looked for with much interest. Private telegraphic despatches have been received which bring the accounts from Canton to the 26th November. These advices state that the Chinese authorities, the few thousands had been engaged in the struggle, and that great numbers of troops are still being sent to the province. The Chinese Government at Canton, charged with the delivery of the ultimatum of Russia to the Persian Government, has left for Teheran. The Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, charged with the delivery of the ultimatum of Russia to the Persian Government, has left for Teheran. Such orders have been given to the Persian troops to march under the command of the Shah in person, in all the forts attached to the residence of the Shah. The Russian Minister on the Caspian Sea has already left for Persia. The Persian Islands allege that treaties of peace exist between Persia and Russia

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is, of course, improbable that the ceremonial of the opening of Parliament, on Tuesday fortnight, will be graced by the presence of the Sovereign. A more interesting social event is expected to occupy her Majesty at a date now by no means remote. And as the speech from the Throne can contain little congratulatory matter—the completion of the Peace, made eight months ago, being perhaps the exception—its commonplaces can be very properly delivered by the Lord Chancellor, from whom, however, the recommendations to the vigorous law reforms which we are promised will sound rather amusingly. If, too, as is threatened, the Income-tax is to come off only to be put on again, any solemn allusion to such a measure of relief will come better from gravity in horsehair than in the sincere tones of the Sovereign. This, we trust, is a loyal view of the case, and the way to make the best of the expected deprivation of her Majesty's presence.

The Chinese "war," according to the latest accounts, seems to be assuming proportions which render it more worthy of that name. Fighting was said to be going on; and the Americans, enraged at the murder of three of their countrymen, whose heads had been set upon the gates of Canton, had made common cause with England, and were rendering her all the co-operation in their power. Meantime the Chinese revolution was prospering, and the chances of the present dynasty did not appear to be so brilliant as heretofore. We observe that a plan is set up on behalf of the Chinese by some excellent men who have lived near them, and who contend that the original nation was both highly civilised and exceedingly humane and hospitable, and that all their vices are of Tartar derivation. Be this as it may, the Chinese say more virtuous speeches and practise more atrocious vices than any nation in the world; and it is rather curious that the same class who, not unfairly, ridiculed the sentimentalism that was talked about the Turk early in the war, are now whining and fondling over the debauched and cruel Chinaman.

It is stated, upon authority of no light character, that the unfortunate man Milano, who attempted to destroy the Neapolitan Sovereign, was subjected to a series of hideous tortures before he was brought to the scaffold. The list is given with so much minuteness that one is alternately sickened at the recital and puzzled to comprehend how such very precise information was obtained. The executioners of Ravaillac and Damien might have taken a lesson in cruelty from the servants of King Ferdinand, if the account be true. There is no means of testing the statement. It may be denied by the authorities, or it may be left to be believed, with a view of striking terror into the other conspirators, who Milano declared were ready to avenge him. But, if true, it will be utterly impossible for any human being to feel the slightest regret at anything that can happen to a Monarch capable of permitting such execrable barbarity. King Bomba seems to sit not so much on a volcano as among a group of mines. One after the other blows up, to the astonishment and terror of Naples. First a magazine goes off, next a first-class frigate is blown to pieces, and then a steam-engine boiler explodes. "The second bill of exchange," said the King, as the roar of the frigate-explosion broke forth. The Sovereign would appear to be aware of his liabilities, and yet he obstinately refuses to call his creditors together.

Our law courts are in full business. The bullion robbery case, to be succeeded by that of Redpath, is the most prominent; but the singular evidence had been read so carefully on the police investigation that the proceedings lack much of the charm of novelty. The question to which we adverted some time back, in mentioning the case of Swynfen v. Swynfen—namely, the liability of a client to be bound by the agreement of counsel has come on again, upon appeal; and it has been very rationally decided that one engages a barrister for fighting, not for negotiation. The bargain made by Sir P. Thesiger for Mrs. Swynfen has therefore been rescinded. It was said that the accomplished advocate, whose skill no one ever doubted, made the bargain in question because he suddenly saw a weak point in his case, which had been missed up to that time, and on which he feared his antagonist might dart. We presume that a new trial will show whether this was a mere suggestion or a fact. The stakes are worth a fight.

Another point has been raised in a court of law of an inferior order. In a case at Newcastle the evidence of one of the parties was refused, not, so far as appears by the report, because he would not press his lips to a printed volume, but because he admitted his disbelief that his welfare in a future state would be at all interfered with by anything he might say after taking the oath. On this ground he was denied the benefit of resort to the tribunal. Now, it is utterly needless for us to say that we entertain for a man who could make this statement simply the compassion which we are all taught to feel for the ignorant. The non-comprehension of the Christian doctrine of a future state implies an imperfectly-instructed mind, or an imperfectly-developed intellect. When Shelley chose to inscribe himself, in Greek, in a book kept for travellers, as "an Atheist," some traveller who followed him added, in Greek also, "and a fool." And, in the sense in which we have placed the matter, the commentator was justified in using the epithet. In the present case the parties—both plaintiff and defendant are stated to be in the same mental muddle—are not Shelleys, but probably a couple of specimens of a type common enough among the lower class, that of the half-educated and wholly-conceited sceptic. But we are not so clear that the law should refuse its aid to such persons. Are they to be debarred from justice because they are silly? The idiot and the madman pleads by his next friend, or "committee"—surely the foolish sceptic ought not to be simply kicked out of court, under a fire of abuse from an attorney. A larger question is involved, of course, but large questions are never settled by legislation—small ones have a chance, as small men can settle them.

As if we had not enough of law, the lawyers themselves are falling out. The old feud between the country and the metropolitan attorney has burst out afresh; and the Law Times and the Legal Observer—representatives of the two factions—are opening fire in earnest. It may do us well that the public should comprehend a little about this, and the question is plain enough. The tendency of the proposed reforms in the conveyancing system will be much to the detriment of the country solicitor, much of whose business is conveyancing. In itself this might not appear a matter for many tears on the part of the nation. But it is to be remarked that the respectable country solicitor is that which we can hardly affirm the majority of the legal profession to be—namely, a valuable and useful member of society. He lives in a small community whose eye is upon him, he is half a country gentleman, and his neighbours look to him, not for professional advice only, but for friendly counsel, and they get it. As an arbitrator he is incessantly preventing actions and suits; and, moreover, he is seldom too highly paid. Now, a change which should prevent this class of men from obtaining an honourable existence would be detrimental to the interests of society; and the questionable advantage of enabling some London solicitors to keep carriages instead of broughams, and to buy country villas instead of hiring mansions at Ramsgate and Boulogne, would scarcely be an equivalent. This is the view of a question which has most bearing upon the general interests of the public—that conveyancing is far too expensive is a fact that there is no denying. The country attorneys have a strong hold upon the House of Commons, for good reasons, and will fight out their battle we doubt not.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CITY OF LONDON HOSPITAL FOR DISEASES OF THE CHEST, VICTORIA PARK.—The annual meeting of the governors of this institution was held on Tuesday, at the London Tavern; Joseph Gurney Barclay, Esq., in the chair. The report of the committee, which was then adopted, showed that during the past year the number of out-patients had been 5987, or 953 more than the previous year; and there had been an average attendance of 512 each week. The number of in-patients had been 403, and these had been retained on an average for a period of rather more than six weeks. The receipts had amounted to £3393 16s; and the expenditure to £3812 18s. 11d.; and the liabilities had been further increased to £1000. Arrangements have been made with a kindred charity, the Western Institution—by which patients may in future be sent to Torquay.

STOCK EXCHANGE.—The committee of the Stock Exchange has adopted the following resolution, with the view of checking [illegible] shown by some members of that establishment in undertaking [illegible] and these had been retained on an average for a period of rather more than six weeks. The receipts had amounted to £3393 16s; and the expenditure to £3812 18s. 11d.; and the liabilities had been further increased to £1000. Arrangements have been made with a kindred charity, the Western Institution—by which patients may in future be sent to Torquay.

STOCK EXCHANGE.—The committee of the Stock Exchange has adopted the following resolution, with the view of checking [illegible] shown by some members of that establishment in undertaking [illegible] transactions for clerks, of the nature recently illustrated in the instance of Redpath, Robson, and others:—"The committee particularly caution members of the Stock Exchange against transacting speculative business for clerks in public or private establishments without the knowledge of their employers. Members disregarding this caution are liable to be dealt with in such a manner as the committee may deem advisable."

THE LINENDRAPERS', SILKMERCERS', LACEMEN'S, HABERDASHERS', AND HOSIERS' INSTITUTION.—The twenty-fifth annual ball in aid of the funds of this institution was held on Tuesday night, at Willis's Rooms, and the stewards had the gratification to find that their calls upon the several trades were responded to by the most numerous and one of the best assemblages of the season. Nearly 800 persons expressed their best wishes for the prosperity of this useful society.

ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY.—The annual general meeting of this society was held on Wednesday last; Mr. B. B. Cabbell in the chair. It appeared from a report of the proceedings of the society during the past year that—in addition to bronze medals, testimonials, and pecuniary rewards, thirteen silver medals were awarded by the society to persons who had risked their lives to save others from being drowned. Last year 201,000 persons bathed in the Serpentine River, and forty-seven casualties (including attempted suicides) had occurred, of which number four proved fatal. During the skating season forty persons had been rescued by the society's keepers in the parks and Kensington-gardens, and no fatal accident had occurred. The number of skaters and sliders was estimated at upwards of 40,000.

A PIECE OF PLATE and purse of gold have been presented to the Rev. Albert Alston, M.A., on his resignation of the Curacy of St. George's, Hanover-square. Mr. Alston, who is now Chaplain to the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, was Curate of St. George's for nine year and during that time was very active and popular amongst the more humble class of his parishioners, a considerable number of whom subscribed to the testimonial fund.

MEETING OF UNEMPLOYED WORKMEN.—A meeting of unemployed workmen, numbering between 800 and 1000, was held on Monday, in Smithfield, for the purpose of concerting measures to relieve the distress at present prevalent among workmen. The majority of the meeting appeared to consist of masons, bricklayers, coachbuilders, carpenters, and labourers. Pierce, a journeyman carpenter, acted as chairman. In a speech of great moderation he stated that it was computed that at least one-fourth of the workmen of the metropolis had, for some time, been out of employment. He disowned any connection with Chartists, and said he wished to obtain the desired end by legal means. Resolutions were carried recommending that application should be made in masses at the poor-law unions, and that the Government should be requested to commence an extensive system of emigration, and to remove all taxes on consumable articles. The proceedings were of a very quiet character.

FIRE AT RICHMOND.—The old mansion at Richmond-green known as Hope House, and devoted for several years to a school for the education of daughters of naval officers, was destroyed by fire early on Sunday morning. The house having recently been purchased by the governors of the new Cavalry College, a number of workmen had been actively employed, in order that it might be opened for business on the 1st of February. The fire was discovered about half-past five in the morning, but, as little water could be obtained for nearly two hours, no portion of the mansion could be saved, and when additional engines arrived the exertions of the firemen were almost useless. It is supposed that the fire must have occurred from the carelessness of the workmen in leaving charcoal fires burning without any person to attend them. The mansion and premises were insured in the Sun and Phœnix fire offices.

THE LONDON COAL TRADE.—The quantity of coals imported into London by sea, in 1856, amounted to 3,119,884 tons; 1855, 3,016,863 tons; increase last year, 103,016 tons. By railway and canal, in 1856, 1,241,790 tons; 1855, 1,161,086; increase, 110,614 tons. The total sea-borne coal into London in December, 1856, exceeded that of the corresponding period of 1855 by 107,000.

THE FRAUDS ON THE CITY BANKS.—Saward and Anderson, charged with the commission of a number of forgeries, were again brought before the Lord Mayor, on Wednesday last, for further examination. A number of witnesses were examined for the prosecution, whose evidence all went to prove the charges brought against them, of which we gave a statement last week. The prisoners were remanded till next Wednesday.

CAB ACCIDENT TO TWO LADIES—PROBABLE LOSS OF LIFE!—A frightful occurrence took place near Hyde-park-corner, Piccadilly, at a late hour on Tuesday night. Miss Sparks and Miss Philbrow, of Hammersmith, got into a cab, the driver of which was drunk. He drove the horse up the bank by the side of the road and upset the cab which was broken to pieces. The ladies, who were seriously injured, were conveyed to St George's Hospital. Miss Sparks's injuries were so severe as to render her recovery doubtful.

ALLEGED FORGERIES BY A STOCK AND SHARE BROKER.—An adjudication in bankruptcy against a Mr. White, who carried on business as a stock and share broker, in Cashion-court, Broad-street, was lately made; and since then several officers of the detective force have been engaged in endeavouring to effect his capture, as there appears to be little doubt that he has obtained a large sum of money—said to be £15,000 on Certificates and shares in the following companies: The Peel River, the Oriental Gas, the Quartz Rock Mariposa Gold Mining, the British Australian Gold Mining, the Liberty Mining (United States), and the Mexican South American. The furniture of the bankrupt at his residence in Holme hill has been seized, together with some houses at Notting-hill. It is supposed the bankrupt has gone to Australia, but that he has not taken much cash with him. He was a young man, and considered very respectably connected. He was not a member of the Stock Exchange.

HEALTH OF LONDON.—In the week that ended on Saturday, the deaths of 1138 persons—viz., 577 males and 561 females—were registered. The average number of deaths in the ten weeks corresponding with last week of the years 1847-56 was 1251; but as the deaths of last week occurred in an increased population, the average must be raised proportionally to the increase for the purpose of comparison, and in this case it will become 1376. The number of deaths recorded last week is less by 241 than would have been returned if the average rate of mortality had prevailed. Last week the births of 846 boys and 817 girls, in all 1663 children, were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1847-56 the average number was 1317.

Monday last being the first day of Hilary Term, the Lord Chancellor entertained the Judges and Queen's Counsel at breakfast. The Lordships afterwards proceeded to Westminster Hall and Lincoln's Inn, to open their respective courts.

Orders have been given by which the names of the streets in all the towns of Spain, which were changed in consequence of the events of 1854, are to be restored.

It is now definitively arranged by the European and Australian Company to run lines of steamers from Ceylon to Madras, Calcutta, and China, in connection with their Australian mail line.

M. Munchs, Secretary to the Mayoralty of Aix-la-Chapelle, has disappeared, and carried off nearly 18,000 rix dollars belonging to the town treasury.

The Court of Directors of the East India Company have given their assent to the construction of the submarine telegraph along the Persian Gulf.

M. Raphael Felix, brother to Mdlle. Rachel, now takes the principal part in the "Fils de la Nuit," at the Porte St. Martin, vice M. Fechter, intrigued by many months' repetition of the same character, and who has to study a new part.

Our diplomatic service in the last year, ended March, cost the country, £281,268.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE POULTRY SHOW.

THE Crystal Palace Poultry Show has been a success; was well arranged, and well supported by the public, considering the time of the year, and the difficulty of getting to the Palace.

Every class, from the highest to the humblest, take an interest in the poultry-yard; the natural love of beauty and of [illegible] with the equally natural love of eggs, pancakes, and [illegible] fowls turkeys, geese (fed à la Goldsmith), ducks roast and boiled, pea-fowl to make up for pheasants when [illegible] of the beautiful in plumage must have been satisfied [illegible] Palace Show—one more instance of the manner in which [illegible] who do not understand or appreciate many Continental [illegible] artistic beauties, do appreciate and excel in cultivating the [illegible] nature. If our furniture and our bonnets be frightful, we [illegible] to produce gardens and parks, flowers and trees, horses [illegible] poultry, cattle, and sheep in perfection.

The total entry of poultry, exclusive of turkeys, ducks, and [illegible] was upwards of 900. Two-thirds of these entries consisted [illegible] and two hens: therefore there were somewhere [illegible] fowls exhibited a great exhibition, but less than [illegible] numbers than for the general average of meat [illegible]

The arrangement of prizes was that now [illegible] winter shows. That is to say first, three prizes for [illegible] hens over one year old; second, three prizes for [illegible] pullets hatched the same year; and third, one [illegible] best cock of any age, of any variety of [illegible] colour. We have not space to give all the prizes, which fill [illegible] seven pages, so must be content with passing notes. In [illegible] there were seventy-three pens and twenty-one single cocks [illegible] fine display of clean, lively birds, the cocks almost [illegible] excess of the white lobe which distinguishes this bird from [illegible] game-fowl. In the young class, pronounced by the [illegible] good, Miss Rake won the first prize with one pen. The best cock went to Master M'Gregor Rake, who was so determined to sell his single entry that he put a price of £200 upon him. Dorkings were surprising to those who have not watched the progress of these birds since shows began: they [illegible] Cochins in size and excel them in symmetry. The [illegible] first and second prize for old birds, Mr. [illegible] hens, we hear, a hen weighing 10 lb. 7 oz. Dorkings [illegible] fancy; we observe among the prize winners and "commended" Eleanor Cathcart and Miss Florence Cathcart, Lady Margaret Donald, Lady Dacre, Lord Robert Grosvenor, [illegible] Throughout the exhibition the clergy are very [illegible] Fisher Hobbes, of Essex agricultural notoriety, was [illegible] for a grey Dorking cock, which he determines not to [illegible] £100 on him. There were upwards of 300 Dorkings shown.

The Cochins were divided into three colours, with two classes to each, and a class for cocks in all about 320 birds, very fine on an average, but nothing new about this [illegible] to-be-cocked breed, which is the best [illegible] The Rev. G. Hodgson, of North Pet[illegible] tained two first and one third prize for [illegible] and second and a "commended" for Dorkings [illegible]

Next came the handsomest and least profitable [illegible] [illegible] "black-breasted red [illegible] winged, with [illegible]s and blue;" about 300 specimens [illegible] colour and form. [illegible] on the Rev. T. E. A[illegible] Oswald, with a [illegible] and second prize with [illegible] and Earl of Derby's breed; while [illegible] to Mr. Sewell with a black-breasted red cock two spl[illegible]

The Polish were divided into black with white crest[illegible] silver. They are quite a fancy fowl; very good layers, but very difficult to keep up to a fair standard of excellence. There is a tradition that white Poles with black crests once existed, but they do not seem to be revived by the prize system. The next breed to the Poles—the Malays—puzzle us much. What is their merit? They are all legs and neck. They are ugly; they are not good layers; are very inferior for the table, and not to be compared with Cochins, which they most resemble, even for weight. They [illegible] coal with no breast. Yet the class of Malay cocks were distinguished by the judges as "one of the best classes yet seen." In the class "any other distinct breed" the Hon. Miss Coleridge, of Ston, Windsor, was winner of two first and a second prize for Polish gold and Polish silver fowl, carried of the first prize for white Polish fowl—price £100; Dawson, of Hopton Merfield, Yorkshire, a second prize for Sultans, while commendation was awarded to several pens of China silk fowl, which, with white feathers and black skin and bones, can only be admired as hideous curiosities or rarities, as they are neither pretty nor useful. Bantams were shown in great force in five colours: gold-laced, silver-laced, white, black, and in any variety. They are too well known to need description.

There were only eighteen entries of Geese—the first prize for white going to Mr. Beavington, of Hounslow, Emden pen; and the first prize for grey and mottled to Mr. Davis, of Hounslow, pen of Toulouse, magnificent birds—the gander weighing twenty-three pounds—price £21.

The white Aylesbury Ducks were finer than many geese. The first prize pen, from Mr. Ford, Ide, near Exeter, was wonderful; price £100—that is to say, not for sale at any price. The second prize was from Aylesbury, and the third from Reigate. The judges consider this an excellent class. The sober and succulent Rouens were equally distinguished for size, and a very good class. The judges give the same praise to the class for ducks of "any variety," where the Rev. T. B. Pryor, of Stevenage, Herts, took the first prize with his pen of black East Indian; and Mr. Crane, of Tolpuddle, Dorset, the second with his pretty white call ducks, which the Crystal Palace manager would do well to purchase for the lake. The Hon. Miss Dillon, of Ditchley Park, took a third prize with her black Buenos Ayres, which are, we believe, the same as those called East Indian. We did not see any black or rather bronze-coloured ducks so elegant as those we kept at the old decoy near Aylsby, in Lincolnshire. There they are bred down to be not much larger than a teal. They fly like wild ducks, and are most delicious eating—far superior to the large breeds.

The Turkey show was small. The Rev. Thomas Fellows, of Brighton Rectory, Norfolk, won a first prize for his Cambridgeshire breed, and a second prize for his wild American breed. These wild Americans give hardiness and flavour, but diminished size. French turkeys are desirable importation for crossing our old breeds. A first, second, and third prize in turkeys of the Cambridge breed were won by Mr. Fellows, of Cheveley Park, Newmarket.

In Pigeons we cannot pretend to be very learned: we know that it was a very beautiful exhibition, of which the judge [illegible] very good and interesting," "very superior." One prize [illegible] in this instance we may call it—for a [illegible] the end of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] five prizes, besides two commended, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

FORT AND TOWN OF ALESSANDRIA

SARDINIA.—THE FORTRESS OF ALESSANDRIA.

THE speech of the King of Sardinia at the opening of Parliament, on the 7th inst., makes no express mention of the defensive works now going forward at Alessandria, but there can be no doubt as to the firm determination of Victor Emmanuel on that as well as on every other point which relates to the independence of Sardinia. "The Government, relying upon the national sentiment which expresses will pursue with constancy the same policy in which it has persevered."

As regards the fortress of Alessandria represented in the Illustration above—a Turin journal gives the following particulars relating to the new fortifications now in course of execution.

The spot where Alessandria now stands was occupied in 1168 by a small town called Rovereto situated near the two rivers Tanaro and Bormida. During the wars of the Guelphs and Ghibellines its strong position attracted the attention of the latter, who surrounded it in 1169 with a mud wall, and called it Alessandria. From the circumstance that straw was mixed with mud, to give it sufficient firmness the people gave it the name of Alessandria della Paglia, which it retains to this day. In 1174 Frederic Barbarossa besieged it with a formidable army, but was obliged to raise the siege after it had lasted seven months. It was subsequently besieged, and changed hands several times. In 1515 the Emperor Frederic II took and sacked it. In 1278 the Marquis of Montferrat, governor of the Milanese, took possession of it, and surrounded it with brick walls and towers. In 1614 the Spanish commandant, Conde de Sarcella, turned the waters of the Bormida into the moat to increase its strength; and in the following year the fortress received eight ravelins, also surrounded with wet ditches. The present citadel was commenced in 1735, and completed in 1749. On the 12th of October of the same year Alessandria capitulated, and was occupied by the Spanish troops under the orders of the Marquis of Carracciol; this was the last time it was taken after a siege. In 1796 the citadel was given up to the French, it was blockaded by the Russians in 1799, and capitulated on the 1st of November of that year. It was again taken possession of by the French in 1800, after the memorable battle of Marengo. Generals Marescat and Chasseloup refortified it at a cost of 50,000,000 francs, and rendered it one of the strongest fortresses in Europe; but after the fall of the first Empire the Austrians destroyed the whole of the works. The plan which is now to be carried out consists of a bastioned body and four detached forts, one situated on the Bormida, a second on the Tanaro, and the other two to the east and south-east of the place. This fortress, with the aid of Casale on one side and Genoa on the other, will enable a body of from 20,000 to 25,000 men to keep a much larger army in check for many months, until the arrival of succour from other quarters.

The following portion of the Royal Speech will be read with interest by the friends of freedom in Italy:—

Sardinia issued from the Congress with the reputation of political prudence and civil courage. For the first time in a European Congress, the interests of Italy were defended by an Italian Power. Loud cheers.] and it was most evidently demonstrated for the universal good, the necessity of improving its condition. [Renewed and prolonged cheers.] My Government, secured of your assistance and strengthened by the national feeling, which never ceases to manifest itself with great and spontaneous demonstrations, will constantly persevere in the policy which we have initiated. Cheers. The return of peace more favourable harvests the progressive development of the national wealth, having ameliorated the condition of the public treasury, you will discuss, for the first time, a budget in which the ordinary expenses and the income are perfectly equal. Cheers. Less preoccupied by financial matters, you can, gentlemen, in the present session, complete the reforms of the provincial and communal administration of the judicial organisation of the instructors, as well as of other branches of the public service on which you have already been on other occasions called to deliberate. Signori Senatori, Signori Deputati, the severe trials that with the aid of Providence we have overcome, the great works completed in the midst of extraordinary financial difficulties, the part which we have taken in European policy, make clear the efficiency and the goodness of the institutions which our magnanimous father granted to his people. Enthusiastic cheers. Rendered more solid by time, made fruitful by the intimate union of the throne with the nation, they assure to our country a future of prosperity and glory.

SKETCHES FROM NAPLES

THE ISLAND OF NISIDA.

NISIDA.

WHOEVER has travelled from Naples to Pozzuoli will recognise the Island of Nisida, the subject of our Sketch. Much and pleasantly associated with classic and mediæval history, it is far from being agreeably connected with the history of modern times. It was once the property of Lucullus, who connected it by a bridge thrown over arches and piles with the adjoining rock of the Lazaretto, which is close to his villa at Posilippo, now called the School of Virgil. Here Cicero had an interview with Brutus, who was then on a visit to the son of Lucullus, or, at all events, sojourning in his house. Here, too, the Queen Johanna resided for some time, and from the towers then standing on the heights repulsed the Duke of Guise. On this site, in more modern times, has been erected an "Ergastolo"—a building which, by law, must be upon an island, and to which are confined those who are condemned to imprisonment for life. This place is reserved in an especial manner for priests, who, according to a convention concluded between Gregory XVI. and the Government of the Two Sicilies in 1834, must be confined in separate prisons. Between Nisida and the Point of Posilippo is the rock of which we have already spoken. The Duke of Alba, under Philip IV. of Spain, built a Lazaretto upon it in 1624, and, moreover, founded a little port, by erecting a mole, which defended it from the west. The most recent public work of any consequence here was effected by the counsel and under the superintendence of the engineer Giuliano de Fazio. In 1834, upon the ancient Roman piles, he constructed the Mole, with approaches; thus enlarging the port, and connecting the Lazaretto with the island. At the extremity is a revolving light. Spite of its vines, and its olives, its figs, its mushrooms, and its asparagus, all so celebrated and so dear to the gourmand, it is a melancholy place to look upon. That large whitewashed building on the top strikes even the stranger as a suspicious-looking spot, a place of unknown suffering and woe; whilst the Neapolitan casts a hurried glance at it, and exclaims, "Ecco l'Ergastolo!" The very name has something harsh and menacing, how much more so is the reality? The Lazaretto is noted as one of the worst in the Mediterranean; and many, to avoid the rude accommodation, the impositions and extortions practised there, have foregone their intention of visiting "Il pezzo di cielo caduto in terra," rather than encounter the horrors of that sanitary prison-house. How sad and silent the place looks! The opposite shore is almost abandoned; a single house stands there to offer hay to a horse and doubtful refreshment to a Christian; while a solitary mariner sleeps in his berth on the borders of the sea, waiting, like old Charon, for some unhappy fare.

ISCHIA.

ONE of the most interesting excursions to be enjoyed in the vicinity of Naples is that to Ischia, the largest island in the famed Bay. It is separated from Procida by a channel two English miles in breadth. The shape of Ischia is an irregular ellipse, the circumference of which is rather more than twenty miles, measuring from headland to headland, exclusive of the sinuosities of the coast. Monte Epomeo, the highest point, is 2574 feet above the level of the sea. On the north-east is the Castle, which is distant twenty miles from the Mole of Naples.

Before Vesuvius resumed its activity in the reign of Titus, Ischia was the principal scene of volcanic action, and, in fact, the safety-valve for the whole of Southern Italy. Monte Epomeo (already mentioned), the Epopos of the Greeks, the Epopeus of the Latin poets, which rises gradually near the centre of the island, "like an Etna in miniature," evidently forced part of the wall of a great crater, of which the other remains are seen at various places on the south side. On the north and west the island slopes gradually down to the sea, and terminates in a beach; while on the south and east it plunges into the sea in abrupt and lofty precipices. Currents of lava and scoria, which have flowed from the lateral craters of Epomeo, may be traced in many parts of the surface of the island; and in some places vast blocks of trachyte, which have probably been ejected during the eruptions of the larger craters, may be seen protruding through the tufa.

The advanced position of Ischia, commanding the western entrance to the Bay of Naples has made it an important point d'appui for a blockading force; hence it has been the scene of many a fierce and sanguinary struggle during the dynastic wars and revolutions of the kingdom.

The baths of Ischia have enjoyed high reputation from the earliest period of the Greek colonisation of the island. No spot of the same extent in the known world contains such a number of hot mineral waters; and so rich is the island in springs, that many valuable waters, which would make the fortune of any town in continental Europe, are allowed to run waste, or are used for domestic purposes. They contain muriates of soda, sulphates, and carbonates of soda, combined with the salts of magnesia, of lime, and occasionally of potash, with a considerable volume of free carbonic acid gas.

Bishop Berkeley frequently declared that one of the happiest summers he ever enjoyed was passed in Ischia. This was in 1717; and one of his delightful letters, written probably to Pope, describes the natural beauties of the island in language which is still as appropriate as it was a century and a half ago:

> The island is an epitome of the whole earth, containing within the compass of eighteen miles a wonderful variety of hills, vales, rugged rocks, fruitful plains, and barren mountains, all thrown together in a most romantic confusion. The air is, in the hottest season, constantly refreshed by cool breezes from the sea; the vales produce excellent wheat and Indian corn, but are mostly covered with vineyards interspersed with fruit-trees. * * * * The hills are for the greater part covered to the top with vines, some with chestnut-groves and others with thickets of myrtle and cistus. The sides of the mountains are divided by hedges or rows of myrtle. Several fountains and rivulets add to the beauty of the landscape, which is likewise set off by the variety of green and barren spots and naked rocks.

The Bishop then describes Epomeo:—

> Its lower parts are adorned with vines and other fruits; the middle affords pasture to flocks of goats and sheep; and the top is a sandy-pointed rock, from which you have the finest prospect in the world, surveying at one view, besides several adjacent islands lying at your feet, a tract of Italy about 300 miles in length, from the promontory of Antium to the Cape of Palinurus, the greater part of which hath been sung by Homer and Virgil, as making a considerable part of the travels and adventures of their two heroes.

DODD'S "PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, KNIGHTAGE, &c.—(Whittaker and Co.—The new edition of this highly-accredited volume has just appeared with so many novel features as to render it quite a new work from beginning to end, in consequence of the revision rendered from the close of the war having been attended by so large an addition to the Order of the Bath, so many creations of other titles, and so extensive promotions in the Army and Navy. Again, the casualties and deaths by disease in the course of the same conflict, together with the consequent succession to titles have led to very many changes; the number of persons of British title who have been decorated not only with medals and clasps, but with the various grades of the French Legion of Honour, the Turkish Order of the Medjidie, the Sardinian Order of Savoy, &c., &c., Knights and Companions, &c., have largely added to the contents of the volume; the services of our French allies have also been commemorated by the addition of upwards of a hundred titles of the Empire; the Garter and Thistle and several ladies have been authorised by the Queen to assume the rank which they would have been entitled to if their husbands had not fallen in the Russian war, but have received the honours designed for them—these have contributed to enlarge this new edition. Civil services and political changes have also led to Knighthoods, Baronetcies, and additions to the Privy Council; and several new Bishops have been consecrated. These and other changes have been diligently attended to by the editor and his suggestive correspondents. The result is a work alike recommended by its on argot contents and its facility of reference, which are prime requisites in an office-book like the present.

DODD'S "PARLIAMENTARY COMPANION FOR 1857."—Twenty-fifth year—(Whittaker and Co.)—This useful compendium has been thoroughly revised to the time of publication; which had become necessary by the great changes which have occurred since the last general election more than one hundred and forty new members having since that time been returned, and a corresponding number having relinquished their seats, or died. In addition to minor alterations are the promotions in the Army, which have occured both among Peers and Commoners. The record of the nobles of each member has been carefully made; and the like painstaking zeal is shown in their pledges and opinions respecting great questions of the day; as Vote by Ballot, the Income-tax, Church Rates, the Admission of Jews to Parliament, National Education, &c.

THE OUTBREAK AT VALENCIA.—The Madrid journals of the 4th contain [illegible] of the outbreak at Valencia already alluded to in our last. [illegible] struck up the gates of the town, and in different streets, prohibiting all persons from offering provisions for sale under pain of death, or at least of having their shops sacked. The authorities took more measures. The people who were accustomed to attend the markets presented themselves; some persons, however, who had had in stores of provisions took them to market in the hope of gaining a high price for them, but as [illegible] workmen rushed on them, drove them away, and scattered their provisions in all directions. The civil authorities came up and entreated the mob to disperse, but they refused, and [illegible] demanded the immediate death of that they perceived in [illegible], and their numbers increased and they became more [illegible] every moment, the authorities declared the city in a state of [illegible] this the mob dispersed, and the rest of the day passed off [illegible]; but it was feared that next day there would be a disturbance.

HOW SAWARD CAME TO BE A BARRISTER.—The Law Times says:—The question is properly asked, How did "Jem Saward," who was [illegible] Great City Forgeries, get to the Bar? Or how did Law Lord be discovered as "James Bowlshend Saward, Esq., of the Inner Temple and the Home Circuit"? The date of his call is the 25th of November, 1853. He is been for a long time associated with thieves. Who is he? By what two barristers was he proposed? By whom of the benchers approved? For without this preliminary certificate of character admission of a student is impracticable. The Inner Temple boasts of a sort of preliminary classical examination. Was "Jem Saward" subjected to this? These are questions which the Society has a right to ask, and the proposers might properly be called upon to state what was their knowledge of him.

THE "SUBLIME PORTE."—A curious anecdote is told of the conduct of the Turkish Plenipotentiary in the recent Conferences. Hitherto it has been supposed that no foreign envoy could address the "Sublime Porte" was to use a most respectful locution, and one quite in conformity with the Eastern style which is in favour in the East. But on two different occasions it occurred on reading the despatches over the protocol [illegible] Djemil Bey protested, and said that the "Sublime Porte" was [illegible] and that his positive instructions were that the phrase should [illegible] Sublime Porte" be used for the future. He insisted on [illegible] of Count Walewski that such a change would [illegible] drawing of the protocol that the Turkish Excellency [illegible] tion. Count Walewski, however, attention to desires of [illegible] upon this point, now that they are known, will be paid on future [illegible] from Paris.

THE FRENCH ASSASSIN.—The assassin Vergès has been [illegible] Wednesday to the Conciergerie, to await his trial. He is [illegible] fetched night and day, to prevent him from committing [illegible]. On being asked whether he had chosen an advocate to defend [illegible] that he did not want one, and was prepared to defend himself. It is even reported that he threatened to make disclosures which would necessarily lead to his pardon. The French law does not allow a man to be tried for his life without the aid of counsel, and when a prisoner refuses to name one the Court appoints ex officio an advocate to defend him. In the present case the President has selected M. Nogent-Saint Laurens. It is expected that the trial will commence on the 19th inst., and that M. le Premier President Delangle will preside.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1857.

THE borough of Greenwich is paying the penalty of its past political corruption, and cannot find a decent candidate for its suffrages. The honour, if honour it be, of representing a constituency who are to be bought—and therefore to be sold—has hitherto been somewhat costly, varying from £5000 to £6000, and proper men have kept themselves aloof and declined the luxury. Of the two candidates now in the field, General Codrington and Mr. Sleigh, the first has been invited by a body of influential electors, and the second had merely to ask his own consent, and, as a matter of course, to obtain it. But Greenwich will indeed be hard driven if it have to put up with either. Of Mr. Sleigh's candidature, which is a mere farce, we shall not speak further; but we would ask those electors of Greenwich who have hitherto refrained from voting, either from apathy or from disgust at the venality around them, what qualifications General Codrington has for representing them?—and whether it is not high time that they should bestir themselves, and rescue the borough from the disgrace which has fallen upon it? When the Whig Lord of a rotten borough nominated Sir Fenwick Williams of Kars to a seat in the Legislature merely because he had done his duty as a soldier, and reflected upon the English arms a glow of glory when glory seemed for a moment to be getting scarce, he did a thing which caused people to wonder, and placed a man in Parliament who would have been far better employed in some other sphere of usefulness. But when the constituency of Greenwich hunt up Sir William Codrington, and solicit him to take charge of their interests, a still greater degree of surprise is felt; a surprise which can only be removed on the supposition that, provided he pay the price, the Greenwich people think that the General will do as well as anybody else. Sir Fenwick Williams won a military triumph, but we cannot say as much of Sir W. Codrington. In the Crimea he succeeded to the command without succeeding to the chance of distinguishing himself. That he would have distinguished himself had opportunity afforded we do not for a moment doubt, for it is to be presumed on his part as well as on that of every officer, and every private soldier in the service, that he needed but the chance to take advantage of it, and to deserve well of his country. But it is not because he did his duty and was ready to do it in greater emergencies, that he deserves a seat in Parliament. If so, the various constituencies of the Empire might fill the House of Commons with dragoons and grenadiers, who would severally be quite as much entitled to the honour as the ex-commander in the Crimea.

It is difficult to gather from the addresses and speeches of the gallant General, and from the reports of the uproarious public meetings at which he condescends to allow himself to be bulbed by non-voters, what his political opinions are. It is clear that he opposes the Ballot; and that he is strongly in favour of flogging in the Army. But are these the opinions to recommend him? If there be any public spirit in Greenwich and its contiguous towns; or if more than one-half of the constituency are neither corrupt nor slavish, which we believe to be the fact, we trust that a candidate will yet be found who will neither buy nor sell the electors; and who, taking his stand on his Liberal principles, and on the purity of election, will be returned by a triumphant majority. Is there no resident in the borough fit from his talents, his principles, and his position, to represent it? Is there no man in the immediate vicinity distinguished in public life, and desirous of a seat in Parliament who would honour Greenwich, and be honoured by it if elected as its representative? We see that at some of the public meetings which have been recently held, Mr. Alderman Wire has taken the chair. Why should not the Alderman be invited to stand by the respectable constituents who wish to wipe off the reproach which has settled upon the borough? Mr. Wire is a man who has attained a distinguished position by the force of his own talents and integrity. He is the eloquent advocate of civil and religious liberty; he is a politician who has always wrought hard and well in the Liberal cause; he is accustomed to public life, and in every way fitted to adorn it; and he has, if we are not mistaken, aspired to gain the suffrages of more than one borough. Why should he not represent Greenwich? And, failing the Alderman, who may have reasons of his own for declining the honour, is there no public man who can be induced to come forward for this metropolitan borough—to rescue it from the charge of venality—and to represent it on independent and Liberal principles? We trust that the right man will yet be found, and that the friend of flogging, and the enemy of the Ballot, will be taught in the school of defeat that his political opinions are no more in accordance with those of the constituency than with those of the non-voters of Greenwich.

A PUBLIC meeting was convened on Thursday night, under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury, and at the instigation of certain benevolent persons who call themselves a "Society for the Suppression of Opium-Smuggling." The objects of the Society appear to be twofold;—to prevent opium-smuggling in China in the first instance; and the consumption of opium in that country in the second; both of these objects to be accomplished in some way or other by the action of the British Government. When it is considered that the opium trade with China is of the estimated yearly value of £5,000,000; that the Chinese, far more than British merchants, are the smugglers; that the Chinese Government attempted by a kind of coup d'état to end the traffic in 1837, and incurred in consequence a war with this country, and a loss of £4,200,000 for opium destroyed, and for the war expenses which they forced the British Government to incur; and that to the Chinese opium is as much a necessary or luxury of life as tobacco is to millions of people in this country, we may form some estimate of the very uphill work which these estimable persons have undertaken in agitating for a discontinuance of the traffic on the part either of British or of Chinese merchants. Doubtless the use of opium by the Chinese is demoralising and pernicious; but may not the same be said of the tobacco and gin used by the people of this country? If Lord Shaftesbury and his friends could by any unhappy chance be allowed to legislate in the matters of eating, drinking, or smoking, and to prescribe to their countrymen what personal indulgences they should avoid, where would they stop? First of all, as they condemn the use of opium among the Chinese, they would of necessity, and for consistency's sake, be compelled to raise their voices against the cigars of the upper and middle classes, and the pipes of the poor. Having deprived the British Government of the four or five millions of revenue derived from this source, they would, if their principles were good for anything, and if they were sincere in applying them, endeavour to stop the consumption of gin, whisky, and rum, and perhaps of brandy. This reform would deprive the Chancellor of the Exchequer of another large slice of the national resources. Encouraged by their example and their success, the excellent vegetarians would, as a matter of course, try their hands at the reformation of what they call our barbarous habit of eating "dead flesh," and would do their best to place the sheepwalks 'of the Highlands, of the South Downs, of Devon, and of Wales, under the plough, and to convert the New Smithfield, in Copenhagen-fields, into a potato-market. Lord Shaftesbury and his friends may say that all this is absurd. We agree with them that it is so; but it is not a whit more absurd than their attempt to interfere by British legislation with the opium-smoking, or opium-eating, of the Chinese. If the Chinese Government is powerless to stop the traffic among its own people, and if the Chinese have indulged themselves in the habit till it has become a positive necessity of their existence, what call have Lord Shaftesbury and his supporters to interfere? British merchants, who break the laws of China in smuggling opium, are amenable to the Chinese Government, not to their own; and if it can be proved, as every one knows, that the Chinese authorities wink at, and even encourage, the trade, on what pretence of merb humanity can the British Government interfere? It is really a pity that so much energy, and such an excellent organisation, should be wasted in such impracticable and wrong-headed benevolence as this. Common sense tells us that this country has no other business with the Chinese but to trade with them; and that the best way for Governments to deal with trade is to leave it to itself—unless, like the slave trade, it be inhuman and immoral. This cannot be said of the opium trade; or, if it can, the same denunciation will apply to scores if not hundreds of trades which good, humane, and Christian men have hitherto carried on, unchallenged by the world, and with advantage to themselves. Moreover, if it be not the trade, but the smuggling, which is to be "put down," why not make a beginning nearer home than China? There is extensive smuggling through Gibraltar, and there is smuggling still more extensive across the Pyrenees into Spain. The plain truth is that an agitation like this is simply preposterous. We deplore that the Chinese eat opium; we also deplore that some Englishmen drink too much gin and some Scotchmen too much whisky; but, if a remedy is to be found for any of these evils, we must look for it elsewhere than in the mode recommended by Lord Shaftesbury and the Society with which he has connected himself.

THE COURT.

The hospitalities of the Court for the present year may be said to have commenced at Windsor Castle on Thursday, when the first of a series of theatrical performances took place on a temporary stage erected in St. George's Hall. The piece selected for representation was the "School for Scandal."

The Count of Flanders arrived at Windsor Castle at the close of last week and remains on a visit to her Majesty and the Prince.

On Sunday the Court attended Divine service in the private chapel of the Castle, the Dean of Windsor officiating. The Duchess of Kent and the Princess Amelie of Hohenlohe-Schillingfürst were present. The Count of Flanders went to the Catholic chapel at Claremont.

On Monday the Queen, with the Princess Alice, walked in the Home Park, and visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Count of Flanders, went out shooting. The Prince of Wales rode out on horseback. In the evening the Lord Chancellor and Lady Cranworth, Lord Rokeby, and Lieutenant-Colonel Maude, Royal Horse Artillery, arrived on a visit and had the honour of dining with her Majesty. The Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor and the Hon. Mrs. Wellesley also had the honour to be included

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by the Princess Royal, walked in the Home Park. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Count of Flanders, went out shooting. Lord Rokeby and Lieutenant-Colonel Maude had the honour to accompany the Prince. Lieut.-General Sir Colin Campbell arrived on a visit, and had the honour of joining the Royal dinner party.

On Wednesday the Queen and the Prince walked in the grounds adjoining the Castle. The Prince of Wales went out shooting, and Prince Arthur and the Princess Louise took a carriage drive. All the visitors, except the Count of Flanders, left the Castle.

On Thursday the first dramatic performance took place in St George's Hall. The play was the "School for Scandal," and the principal characters were respectively filled by Mr Webster and Miss Woolgar Mr. A. Mellon)

The Countess of Desart has succeeded Lady Macdonald as Lady in Waiting to her Majesty. Lord Waterpark and Colonel the Hon. N. Hood have succeeded the Earl of Caithness and Lieutenant-Colonel F. Cavendish as the Lord and the Groom in Waiting.

Her [illegible] gay gave birth to a daughter at Albert-gate [illegible]

The Duchess Dowager [illegible] has removed to the late Earl of Cork's mansion, in Hamilton-place, from South-street.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Clanricarde and Lady Harriet De Burgh have arrived at the family mansion, on Carlton-house-terrace, from Ireland.

The sky has been generally greatly overcast, but was clear on the evening of Jan. 12, on the evenings of the 12th and 13th, and throughout the day and evening of the 14th.

REPRESENTATION OF WEST KENT.—The death of Sir Edmund Filmer Bart having made a vacancy in Parliament for West Kent, candidates have already appeared in the field. Two of these have declared themselves Mr. C. Wykeham Martin of Leeds Castle, and Mr. John Whatman, Jun. the eldest son of the late Member for the county. Mr. Whatman is a Liberal, and Mr. Martin a Conservative. Sir Walter B. Riddell Bart., Recorder of Maidstone, has declined the Conservative interest.

REPRESENTATION OF HULL.—Mr. H. W. Schneider, the owner of large mines near Ulverstone, and whose name is well known in connection with the Mexican and South American trade, has announced himself as a candidate to supply the vacancy in the representation of Kingston-on-Hull, occasioned by the elevation of Sir W. H. Watson to the judicial bench.

REPRESENTATION OF PONTEFRACT.—In reply to a requisition from a number of electors in the borough of Pontefract, Mr. William Wood, of Monkhill House, has consented to come forward as a candidate. As regards his opinions on the questions of the day, he says:—"I do not think it necessary to say more than that I consider the time has gone past for party politics, and that all right-minded men to whatever party they may have previously belonged—will henceforward honestly and heartily co-operate in supporting such measures as are based upon common sense and the principle of doing unto others as we would they should do unto us, and those men who are best fitted and most willing to carry out such measures, and to secure the greatest happiness to the greatest number."

MR. JOHN BRIGHT, M.P.—We have great pleasure in stating that the latest accounts of the health of our excellent representative, Mr. Bright, are of a most satisfactory character. After staying some time in Algeria, the hon. gentleman returned to France to meet his daughter. Mr. Bright spent a day with Lord Brougham at Cannes, and has since left for Italy.—Manchester Examiner.

FUNERAL OF MR. BROTHERTON, M.P.—The funeral of the late Mr. Brotherton, M.P., took place on Wednesday last, when his remains were interred in the new cemetery in Eccles Newton, Salford. The funeral cortège included about one hundred carriages, scarcely a public body in the neighbourhood omitting to pay a mark of respect by joining the procession. In addition to the carriages containing the members of the family, there were present those of the High Sheriff and the Bishop of Manchester, and among members of the Legislature present were noticed Mr. W. Brown, M.P., Mr. Hadfield, M.P., Mr. Heywood, M.P., Mr. Kershaw, M.P., and Mr. Cheetham, M.P. There were also carriages containing deputations from the Manchester and Salford Town Councils, the Chamber of Commerce, the Commercial Association, the Manchester and Salford Board of Guardians, the Peel Park Executive Committee, the Lancashire Central Short Time Committee, and Co-operative Society. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. Mr. Mcteaffe, of Philadelphia, the pastor of the congregation of Bible Christians of Cowherdites, of which Mr. Brotherton was a member. An immense concourse of people assembled to witness the funeral.

LOUIS KOSSUTH AND THE WORKING CLASSES OF MANCHESTER.—On M. Kossuth's recent visit to Manchester a public request was made on behalf of the working classes that he would deliver to them a lecture, to which he consented. The lecture will be delivered in the Free-trade Hall on the evening of Saturday, Jan. 24. The subject of the lecture will be "The Political State of Continental Europe."

GOOD NEWS FOR SHOEMAKERS.—Northampton, the great English mart for boots and shoes, has resolved to raise the prices of those indispensable articles, on account of the great advance in the price of the raw material. A meeting of the employers took place last week, at which it was proposed that the manufacturers should henceforward be remunerated by an increase in price of 5, 10, or 20 per cent. Mr. Mansfield, the secretary, said it had been thought that the resolution should state that the cost of material had increased 15 per cent, and that the increase should be 20 per cent. Mr. Marshall said according to that they should raise the price 50 per cent. It was stated by another speaker that some manufacturers had already raised their prices, upon which it was remarked that the resolution to be proposed at the meeting would not bind those who had done so. After a long discussion, in the course of which it was stated that hides had increased in price 300 per cent since 1850, Mr. Moore proposed as an amendment that they resolve on "an immediate advance," expunging the amount. Mr. Lines, of Daventry, seconded the amendment. Mr. Mansfield considered the main object was to support the retailers in establishing an advance with their customers. Ultimately, Mr. Moore agreed to withdraw his motion to secure unanimity, and Mr. Bearn's proposition was agreed to.

A PERILOUS LEAP INTO A COALPIT.—A few days since James Morgan, whipper-in, while hunting with Mr Roch's hounds at Boltonhill, in Pembrokeshire, in taking a hedge, jumped his horse into an unfenced pit, thirty feet in depth, which lay concealed on the other side of the hedge. Man and horse went down the shaft, at the bottom of which was a depth of eighteen feet of water. Fortunately the sides of the pit had been made sloping, so that before the horse was entirely submerged he gained a footing on the slope. The rider was thrown into the water, but on rising grasped the saddle, and thus held his head above the water until assistance arrived, when rope having been procured he was safely drawn up, and, save the shock, perfectly uninjured. The horse was next drawn out, also unhurt.

FLOODS IN NORFOLK.—In consequence of heavy rains, the low lands and marshes in Norfolk have been much flooded, and at many points, on Sunday and Monday, nothing was to be seen but one wide expanse of waters. On Monday afternoon a dense fog prevailed and a lamentable accident occurred at Thorpe, near Norwich, a young man named William Watson, from Great Yarmouth, drove to the side of the river Yare, for the purpose of giving his horse some water. The [illegible] being much swollen, he missed the usual watering place, drove over the river bank into deep water, and was drowned before he could be extricated.

WRECKS OFF SCARBOROUGH.—During the late heavy gales several shipwrecks took place off Scarborough. On observing them the new life-boat was immediately launched and manned by a brave crew, commanded by Mr Thomas Clayburn, who succeeded in rescuing the crews of two Whitby vessels. They then directed their attention to the crew of the Wilsons, which was in most imminent danger, the sea rapidly breaking over the ill fated vessel, the crew and a little boy son of the master, having taken to the rigging. They succeeded in rescuing nine of the crew, one poor lad, about eighteen years of age, fell between the vessel and the life boat and was drowned. At this moment one of the crew of the life-boat, Thomas Luccock, was thrown out of the boat by the violence of the sea, and had a narrow escape—his life-belt was no doubt his preserver. The crew of the life-boat, after rendering assistance to the three ships' crews last mentioned, and nothing daunted with their exertions, immediately went with the intention of saving those on board the fishing-smacks, 11 in driving over the rocks, but found that a cable belonging to Mr. H. Wyvill, had been taken for the same praiseworthy purpose

VERY PARTICULAR.—At last meeting of the Gateshead Poor-law Guardians, a letter was read from the Poor-law Commissioners asking to be informed of the exact quantity of flour used to a pound of suet pudding. After a discussion, a resolution that on the next occasion they were made one of the dumplings should be sent to the Commissioners to judge for themselves was adopted amid loud laughter.

DESPERATE AFFRAY WITH POACHERS.—At an early hour last Monday morning seven of the keepers employed by Sir John Harpur Crewe, Bart., of Calke Abbey, Derbyshire, went out to watch as usual. When they arrived at Fisture Hills they saw two poachers in the act of netting snares. The keepers went up to them to take them into custody, when they were immediately attacked by fifteen other poachers who had been concealed close by. The keepers were only armed with sticks, consequently they were able to make but a feeble resistance against the fire-arms brought against them. A desperate fight ensued, which ended in favour of the poachers. Three of the keepers were dangerously wounded, and now lie in a precarious state. The poachers used bludgeons, and were accompanied by dogs. They had no fire-arms. In the afternoon handbills were out offering £100 reward for the apprehension of the ruffians.

A BURGLAR'S "BUSINESS" LETTER.—A letter found on Daniel Dickinson, of Rawmarch, one of the men in custody on the charge of a daring burglary, with violence and robbery of about £300, at the residence of Mr W. Bradley, brewer, near Sheffield, shows very plainly that a regular organisation has existed, by which burglars and housebreakers in other parts of Yorkshire and the neighbouring counties of Derby and Nottingham, having planned burglaries, have obtained ready aid from a gang in the neighbourhood of Barnsley in the carrying of them out. The letter is as follows:—

Friend—Please to send me word if you can come on Wednesday night and bring 4 or 5 hands with you for no other night will do as all alone. We shall kill about 90 or 95 if all right. Send me word and I will meet you first at Chesterfield or Eckington start at nine Low and day so no more from me

YOUR A FRIEND CHAP.

Direct — Mander 3 Nottingham.

The name in the address is not given, for obvious reasons. It does not require much penetration to discover the true meaning of the letter That the "four or five hares," along with their captain, arrived duly to order, is beyond doubt. Wednesday. It will be observed is fixed upon as "no other night will do." It is a somewhat singular coincidence that on a Wednesday, the 3rd December, Dickinson is traced to a railway station, on a line communicating with "Eckington or Clesterfield;" and that, shortly after one o'clock on the morning of Thursday, the residence of Mr Robinson and his wife, aged respectively seventy-eight and seventy, residing "near to" at Pleasley, a few miles from "Mansfield, Nottinghamshire," was broken into by a party of burglars, two of whom remained on guard outside, while five, with their faces covered with masks, and carrying a dark lantern and short heavy sticks, entered the bed-room of the aged couple, ransacked the drawers, and, under threats of violence, obtained, not "about fifty or eighty," as indicated in the letter, but £37 10s in cash, and other property. Within twenty minutes after the burglary was committed two of the Nottinghamshire rural police were informed of it; but though a hue and cry was raised the burglars were not discovered. At the burglary at Manor Oaks, near Sheffield, seven burglars assisted; some of them were men from the neighbourhood of Barnsley, a distance of thirteen or fourteen miles, aided by others in Sheffield, but, as yet, the only person against whom conclusive evidence has been obtained are James Gleadhall, of Barnsley, and Daniel Dickinson —on whom the above letter was found, and who is believed to be the captain of the gang.

SAVINGS-BANKS.

MR. SIKES, of Huddersfield, suggests the following improvements:—

1st. The guarantee by the State of all deposits, and the establishment of a General Guarantee Fund.

2nd. The formation of a London department, under whose direction all savings-banks would be conducted. The department to consist of a court of 24 directors, representing the leading savings-banks in the kingdom to meet monthly; and of a staff of officers and inspectors, to be appointed by and under the control of the National Debt Commissioners

3rd. The unapprised inspection and periodical audit of the depositors' books, and the like inspection of every savings-bank in the kingdom.

4th. A considerable extension of the hours for which savings-banks are open.

5th. Where more efficiency would be secured, the making arrangements with private or joint-stock banks to conduct the savings-bank in their several localities.

6th. An increase of the number of savings-banks, and giving much greater facilities (generally speaking) for the deposit and withdrawn of money.

7th. The employment of a portion, say one-fourth of the aggregate capital, in first-class landed securities and railway mortgage bonds, yielding 4 per cent.

8th. The wide diffusion of a knowledge of savings-banks through the medium of public schools, mechanics' institutions, &c.

9th. The establishment of a scale of interest not to be allowed to depositors—3 per cent up to £100, and 2½ per cent on such portion of the balance as is above £100.

10th. The carrying out of Mr Gladstone's plan of liquidating the "balance deficient" by placing in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners Government securities equivalent to the aggregate liabilities of savings-banks.

11th. The periodical publication of a return of all deposits and depositors, classified respectively into occupations and amounts, and of a general balance-sheet, presenting the liabilities on the one side, and the description of securities in which the assets were invested on the other.

12th. All savings-bank moneys to be in the custody and under the control of the National Debt Commissioners, or their officers, and to be employed solely with a view to the interest of the depositors.

[These suggestions of Mr. Sikes are good as far as they go. We must have a real National Bank in connection with the Post Office Money Order Office; we must give facilities to the poor to save with perfect security—also we must let the agricultural labourer have a chance of purchasing a cottage and piece of land, by letting him have free and cheap transfer of land. These improvements were effected by Huskisson, and improved the condition of the labouring classes, and diminish crime, as much or more than school education.]

THE WEST INDIA MAILS.—The Royal mail-steamer La Plata, Captain Weller, arrived at Southampton on Thursday evening, with the mails, twenty-seven passengers, and dollars, gold-dust, &c., to the value of £70,000, and a full cargo.

WE regret to record the death of Major-General William Cox K.H., who expired at St. Leonards-on-Sea on Tuesday. He was a distinguished military officer, having served in the old 88th at Copenhagen, and throughout the whole of the Peninsular war, from 1808 to 1814. He was present at the actions of Roleia, Vimiera, the retreat to Corunna, battles of Vimiera, Nivelle, Nive, passage of the Bidassoa, and battle of Orthes; receiving three severe wounds during the war. In the Kaffir war he had the command of a division under Sir Benjamin D'Urban; and subsequently employed in the Canada difficulties during the insurrection of 1837. Major-General Cox was on the staff in Ireland. He had the war medal and seven clasps for his Peninsular services.

WRECK OF A MAIL STEAM-SHIP.—On Tuesday last the Brazilian mail steam-ship Tyne, on her homeward voyage, ran aground on the Isle of Portland. The whole of the passengers were landed safely. The captain of the Tyne and her officers were on deck when the vessel went on shore, and they say it was impossible to prevent the accident.

THE CREW OF THE "VICTORY."—While so much praise is bestowed on the conduct of those brave fellows who succeeded in saving the crew of the Northern Belle, it must not be forgotten that there on one boat's crew which not merely refused to aid, but threw it away, in a cowardly effort at trying to save the lives of the American sailors. The Victory lugger, belonging to Margate, with a crew of nine men on the look-out for vessels in distress, saw the Belle on the Sand Head Pan Sand, and by a tremendous sea, and every soul perished. These poor men have left wives and families entirely unprovided for. We need not say more to place them side by side in the public sympathies with their more prosperous brethren of the Broadstairs life-boats. The Victory, a well-known boat to many Margate visitors, was worth from £80 to £90, owning to a part of the misses of the crew:—Jane Sully, aged 46, John Smith, aged 32; George Smith, aged 29, father and son; William Emptage, senr., aged 52; John Empinge, aged 28 (father and son); Charles Fuller, aged 32; Henry Seamor, aged 21; Frederick Butt, aged 20; Abraham Bashford, aged 35. We are glad to learn that a meeting has been called for the purpose of promoting a public subscription for the bereaved families of the crew of the Victory.

THE MAIL-BAGS OF THE "VIOLET."—It seems that, on the occasion of the loss of this vessel, an active officer, who had been many years in the service, named Joseph Williams Mortlemans, must have opened the depository, and brought out the mail bags, perhaps to the upper deck, as the only chance, by floating, of their ever reaching home. Without this considerate conduct the probability is they would also be buried in the sand, for the forepart of the vessel was soon two fathoms towards being buried in the after part of the upper deck. Mr. Mortlemans left to bewail his loss a widow and twelve children, two of whom are entirely, and one other partially, dependent on her, as well as an aged father, who she finds herself in an entirely destitute condition.

ILLNESS OF MR. BARON ALDERSON.—We regret to say that the learned Baron is about to go under severe and speedy treatment at his residence in Portland-crescent, the disease being a determination of blood to the head.

We have reason to believe (says the Globe) that Lord Brougham's motive for declining the Chancellorship of the London University was, that his Lordship, holding the office of President of University College, considered that the duties of Chancellor would be incompatible with his present position.

THE WAR WITH CHINA.

THE DUTCH FOLLY FORT, CANTON RIVER.—FROM A PAINTING BY A CHINESE ARTIST.

CANTON, Nov. 14, 1856.

You will have learned by the Overland Mail that our nation is once more at loggerheads with the children of the Sun and Moon—the far-famed Celestials of the Inner Country. The steps which have led to this outbreak are easily recounted, and the justice of our appeal to force must be allowed by all who will take the trouble to consider the case.

The present Governor-General of the two Kwang rejoices in the somewhat peaceable-sounding name of "Yeh." His predecessor, Seu, had been unfortunate against the rebels in the years 1854-5, and was, therefore, superseded by the above-named Viceroy, who, if I am not wrongly informed, is a native of one of the southern provinces, and undoubtedly a man of great abilities; obstinate and blood-thirsty, however, he certainly is to a degree. He was completely successful in beating off the rebel force that threatened the city about the time of his succession to power, and during the last eighteen months has been indulging his desire for vengeance on account of the members of his own family slain by the rebels, by sacrificing whole hecatombs of the suspected people who fell into his hands, in the execution-ground of Canton.

This bloodthirsty propensity of his has at last, however, led him into a difficulty he could hardly have anticipated, or perhaps his successes against the rebels had somewhat dimmed his memory with respect to the events of 1840-41; at any rate his conduct requires some such explanation. The facts of the case, then, are simply these. It appears that a lorcha, named the Arrow, trading on the coast, had anchored off Canton somewhere at the beginning of last October. She was duly registered, was protected by the English flag, and commanded by an English captain. The authorities in the city of Canton having been informed, however, that on board this lorcha were one or two Chinamen who had been formerly engaged in piracy or rebellion, sent a force on board her, who seized the twelve Chinese men composing her crew, and at the same time hauled down the English ensign flying at the peak. To all this the captain of the lorcha swears. Yeh and his functionaries, on the other hand, declare that no colours were flying at the time, and therefore plead ignorance of the vessel being an English one.

Mr. Consul Parkes, having been informed of the proceedings, immediately repaired alongside the lorcha, and being a linguist as well as the chief English authority at Canton, demanded the restoration of the men and an apology for the insult. His interference, however, was treated with contempt; and some threats added involving his personal safety.

Under these circumstances commenced a long correspondence with the Viceroy, throughout which he assumed an arrogant and overbearing tone, and showed an obstinate determination to make no concession.

In this stage of the matter Commodore Elliot, commanding the Sybille, then lying in the Canton river, proceeded to Canton with the boats of his ship in tow of the Coromandel steam-tender, and publicly seized upon an armed junk lying opposite the city, taking her to Whampoa as a prize, or by way of reprisals for the indignities offered to our flag. The Governor-General was duly notified of this proceeding, but this also failed to elicit any satisfactory reply to our demands. Sir John Bowring, her Majesty's Plenipotentiary in China, having likewise expostulated in vain, an ultimatum was at length sent into the Chinese authorities allowing his Excellency the Viceroy twenty-four hours to make the necessary apologies and reparation, failing which, the business would be handed over to the naval authorities, to be by them carried out and enforced. This having been likewise ineffectual to the desired end, it was found necessary to strike, and the first blow was as severe as it was sudden. In two days Sir Michael Seymour had dismantled the whole of the forts on both branches of the river, together with the Red Fort, Bird's Nest, and Shameen Forts, contiguous to the city. I should state that the Bogues and other batteries at the mouth of the river were not attacked at this time.

The next step was to breach the city walls, which was speedily done by landing guns on a small island in the river, called Dutch Folly; and the day following the Admiral, at the head of about 300 men, entered the new city, and penetrated into the interior of the Governor-General's yamun, or official residence. His Excellency himself had wisely vacated the palace, so that no interview could be obtained in that way, although the Admiral had been at considerable pains to bring about a meeting. Sir Michael Seymour the day following duly informed the Viceroy of his proceedings, and besought him to listen to reason, and spare the lives of his dependents, now wholly at our mercy. This humane appeal was treated with derision, and a notification made to the English authorities that they should be all swept into the sea—entirely annihilated—by the "braves," who daily clamoured to be allowed to exterminate them. Under these circumstances it was found necessary to proceed on the offensive. Accordingly, two mortars and three heavy guns having been placed in position on the Dutch Folly, a sharp shelling on the Governmental part of the city was kept up for several days. Two large fires occurred in the suburbs, destroying many hundred houses and very valuable property. Still, however, the Chinese obstinately refused to accede to our demands.

The Admiral, therefore, next proceeded to destroy the junks of war and a fortification situated below the city, called French Folly. The Chinese soldiers here showed an unexpected resistance, firing and reloading their guns with much determination; the junks, however, were speedily burned, and the fort carried by assault. A considerable force then proceeded to attack the Bogue forts, so celebrated in the history of our dealings with China, and for the fourth time during the last few years (beginning with Captain Maxwell, of the Alceste) these forts have been silenced and dismantled.

In this state the matter rests; all trade, of course, is at an end, our factories deserted, and the traffic on the river effectually stopped.

The casualties on our side consist of six men killed (four at the assault on the city, one at the taking of the French Folly, and one at the Bogue), with some sixteen or seventeen wounded. On the part of the Chinese the loss must have been very great.

Two attempts have been made to destroy our ships by fire-rafts providentially both these failed

Where this matter will end we are at a loss to know The Chinese authorities appear resolved to hold out, and we certainly must proceed. Provisions are stopped, and rewards offered for any Englishman's head; so that we are all kept in durance vile unable to move about or carry on any business whatever with people on shore.

The Chinese authorities have issued proclamations calling on all good citizens to resist our "unprovoked" attack, stating as a reason that we have been defeated by Russia in our late war, and have now come to squeeze the people of China, in order to defray our expenses. Has Russia any hand in this matter? E.

Lieutenant H. H. Beamish, of H.M.S. Calcutta, who is mentioned in Sir M. Seymour's despatch as having displayed "cool courage in carrying out an anchor during the heaviest of the fire, to enable the Barracouta to spring her broadside," also took part in the bombardment of Sveaborg, having, with another Lieutenant, the command of a division of rocket-boats in the night attack. At the taking of Rangoon, also, Lieutenant Beamish was one of the first to land. He was then acting Mate of H.M.S. Fox, and for his services on that occasion has received a medal and clasp.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

CANTON.—PLAN OF THE CITY.

THE Engraving upon the front page of the present Number is from a Sketch by our Canton Correspondent of this week: it shows Canton as seen from the English Reach, on Oct. 27, about dusk, with a portion of the suburbs on fire.

The Plan of the City is from a Chinese source, and will indicate to the reader the precise localities mentioned in the accounts of the late bombardment.

THE DUTCH FOLLY FORT, NEAR CANTON.

The Dutch Folly Fort is situated in the centre of the river which flows through Canton, on a small rocky island, and is built close to the water-mark all round it. It consists of two tiers of about fifty guns, one above the other, the lower one in embrasures with houses, trees, &c., in the interior of the fort. The island is a little below the factories at Canton, which can be seen on the right of the drawing, with the several flags of the different Consuls flying; and, from the position of the fort, it has a very commanding site to prevent the approach of an enemy up the river. It was stormed and carried by the Encounter on the 21th October, and held by a party of marines and seamen during the operations of Admiral Sir Michael Seymour, K.C.B., against the city. Two long 32-pounders from the Encounter were got into position in this fort, and materially assisted in breaching the high, massive one wall surrounding the old city. The Dutch Folly Fort was appropriated for the reception of the wounded during the bombardment. We are indebted for the accompanying sketch to Major Raines, 95th Regiment, who was stationed for some years with his regiment at Hong-Kong.

This gentleman possesses a curious caricature of the English at Hong-Kong, which, from its graphic humour, is entitled to special mention. It is supposed to have been drawn by a Chinese inhabitant of Shanghai, to be forwarded with a letter to illustrate the appearance of the English to some of his relations living far in the interior, who had never seen the "Fanquis," or White Devils, as all Europeans are termed by them. The English party are supposed to be returning to the steamer to which they belong, after having paid a visit to the English Consul at Shanghai, who is represented standing in the verandah of the Consulate, after bidding them adieu. Marines and seamen precede the party to the boat. In a chair is seated the Captain's wife, escorted by several officers, followed by seamen and marines; and the rear is brought up by a middshipman and the Indian cook, who is represented with a live cock under his arm.

In the offing is a steamer, which is curiously drawn. The midshipman in the maintop on the look-out, the gun on the forecastle, the inverted ensign, the boat approaching the vessel,—all tend to show their curious ideas of the English. The servant of the Consul—a true Chinese woman—is represented looking through the window at the English departing; and the Consul's look-out man appears above with glass in hand.

CHINESE SOLDIERS.

In glancing at a Chinese army, it seems astonishing that the small band of emaciated British troops, with their few Indian regiments, under Lord Gough, could have escaped utter annihilation. The Chinese coolie can lift and carry a heavier weight than a British soldier, and is often larger than our Lilliputian race; and the Tartar, from his northern birth and education, is stronger still, though not of such large build. But the discipline is wanting.

At Chinese barracks is always a conspicuous object. In front of a low, white-walled house, surmounted with dragon roofs, stand two poles, bearing the banners of the Mandarin in command. A red ball, surmounting a half moon, is painted between every two windows, of which there are generally three on each side of the door. To the left of the building in front is a look-out station, like a sentry-box on stilts; and to the left of that again are three small chimneys, for watch-fires, besides marking a military station these chimneys are in line, at visible distances from each other along the whole length of the coast, for the purpose of conveying intelligence of an attack.

The Chinese soldier labours under every disadvantage. His arms are bad, the matchlock is of the rudest kind, and not brought up in a line with the eye as an English musket is. His powder is of the coarsest brand, and loose. Each soldier, besides his carriouch-box, is provided with a measure, with which he loads his piece. The lances are of the roughest order, being simply a pike placed on the head of a piece of bamboo.

The bow might have been considered a superior weapon of its kind in the early part of the Ta-tsing dynasty, but decidedly is not fitted for modern warfare. It is very difficult to describe the process by placing one end between the ankles, bringing the other over the back, and slipping the string on in front; the value depends on the number of catties one pound and a quarter) required to draw it to a head sufficient for stringing, which varies from one to two hundred catties.

The ordnance department is much on a par. The brass pieces are generally from four and five to twenty pounders, while the iron guns range as high as sixty-eight pounds. They are nearly all of the same shape. On the centre is the name of the foundry, city, province, and Sovereign-General. They are all mounted on gun-boat carriages. The guns are usually painted black, with red stripes, and the carriages red. The powder is provided in a large box.

The dress in no way varies from that of a peasant, except in the jacket and cap. The former is blue, with facings varying in colour according to the regiment; a round white patch in front and rear receives the name of the soldier and his corps which takes some such appellation as "The Noble," "The Never Conquered," &c. The cap is surmounted by a red tassel, and, in the case of an officer, with a ball beside.

The sword is rather a novel contrivance. It consists of two blades and handle in one scabbard, so beautifully fitted together that when drawn out it is one or two weapons, to be used in one or both hands according to the will of the wearer, who is usually very expert with it in either way. In one of the edicts the soldiers were ordered to strike the blades together, and so make a noise that the barbarians would be terrified.

The target, or shield, of the Chinese troops is the most dangerous weapon for offence as well as defence in their opinion. It is painted with some hideous device. The "Tiger Guards" had a furious head of a tiger; which, with the awful grimace and antics, "the tearing of the tough brave in action," cannot fail, say the Mandarins, to awe and terrify barbarians It may be as well here to mention that tiger's flesh, dried and eaten in powder, supplies what we call courage.

Individual bravery was often exhibited in the war in 1842; but in no one instance did the Chinese fight well in a body. The obstinate defence of the fore-house at Sye Kee was not an act of bravery, but deep despair. They had deserved to die for mutilating the bodies of the fallen British soldiers, and feared the resentment of the Royal Irish, whose Colonel had fallen in the attack. Poor fellows! their case was hopeless: they had to face a powerful foe on the one hand, and their ignorant, prejudiced, and more merciless compatriots on the other.

Thus far we have used the term Chinese generally; but, properly speaking, there are two separate armies—the Tartar Pa-ke and the Native which, in truth, are little more or less than an embodied militia, called Lub-ying, or "Troops of the Green Standard." The Tartars muster under eight banners:—yellow with border, yellow without, white with, red with, white without, red without, blue with, and blue without borders. The Tartar and the Chinese troops in different provinces are entirely independent of each other, and have fixed official residences. A Tartar cannot command Chinese, nor a Chinese Tartar troops. Their numbers it would be impossible to arrive at; but, as every tenth male capable of bearing arms is drawn by lot to serve, the force must be prodigious. The Chinese work at their several trades, and some of them hold land; but the Tartars are soldiers by profession. The pay of a common soldier is a mere pittance—a day. The military Mandarins wear chain armour and helmets, presented to them by the Emperor on their arriving at that rank; and, in common with other Mandarins, are entitled to wear the dress—an emblem of rank and office. Its use is to rest the arms upon when sitting.

A Tartar general at Chusan, before the war, petitioned the Emperor to abolish the use of bows and arrows, and substitute the matchlocks as a more efficient weapon. An edict appeared in the Pekin Gazette to the following effect:—"Ignorant fool that you are, know you not that for the last 260 years that our army has been placed on the firmest basis of military power, and would you now that I should alter it? Had a Chinese petitioned me, I should have treated his ignorance with the contempt it would have deserved. But for you, a Tartar, I order you to be degraded from your rank and rendered incapable of ever after redeeming it." In six months after Chusan fell, and the inutility of the bow and arrow was fully shown. The artillery of a regiment consists of a few large matchlocks, each supported on the shoulder of one man, while another takes aim; these carry balls of from one to two pounds weight.

PASSAGE-BOATS BETWEEN CANTON AND MACAO.

These boats ply between Canton and Macao. Nothing here is arid, nothing uncultivated. Hills and vales, bridges and houses, trees and vegetation, alike give token of having known the hand of man: not of man who destroys and levels, but of man who embellishes and adds to the bounty of nature.

Next week we shall further illustrate the localities of the Bombardment with some sketches with which we have been favoured by a Correspondent on board H.M.S. Nankin.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE BISHOP OF CORK.

THE RIGHT REV JAMES WILSON, D.D., Bishop of the united Sees of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took honours in 1802. He became a M.A. in 1809, and a priest in 1810. He was made a D.D. in 1830, was Precentor of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, and Chancellor of the Diocese of Leighlin, and was consecrated Bishop of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, in 1848. The Right Rev. Prelate died on the 6th inst.

THE DOWAGER COUNTESS OF DONOUGHMORE.

BARBARA, Countess Dowager of Donoughmore, whose death from bronchitis occurred at Chiavari, near Genoa, on the 11th ult., was the second daughter of the late Lieutenant-Colonel William Reynell, of Castle Reynell, county Westmeath, by his wife Jane, daughter of the late Sir William Montgomerie, Bart., of Macke-hill, and was the second wife of the late John Hely Hutchinson, third Earl of Donoughmore, who was once so well-known as "Lavalette Hutchinson" from his aiding in the escape of M. de Lavalette. Her Ladyship was married to the late Earl the 6th September 1827, and had issue one son, John William, a Captain in the 13th Light Dragoons, who died in the Crimea in 1855, and three daughters. Her Ladyship became a widow the 14th September, 1851. She was the stepmother of the present Earl of Donoughmore.

LORD MILFORD.

THE RIGHT HON. RICHARD BULKELEY PHILIPPS-PHILIPPS, Baron Milford, of Picton Castle in the county of Pembroke a Baronet, and Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the county of the town of Haverfordwest, died at his seat, Picton Castle, on the 3rd inst., after a short but severe illness. Lord Milford was the only son of John Grant, Esq., of Moulton, near Haverfordwest, by his wife, Mary Philippa Artemisia, who was the only daughter and heiress of James Child, Esq., of Bigelly House, Pembrokeshire, and the sole grandchild of Bulkeley Philipps, Esq., of Aberewen, Carmarthenshire. His Lordship was born the 9th June, 1801, and in 1824 assumed, by sign manual, in respect of the memory of his maternal cousin, Sir Richard Philipps, Baron Milford (a Barony of a former creation then extinct), whose estates he inherited, the surname and arms of Philipps. He was for a long time a prominent member of the House of Commons, having represented Haverfordwest in Parliament for nearly twenty years. He was created a Baronet the 13th February, 1828, and was raised to the Peerage in 1847. His Lordship married, first, Eliza, only daughter of the late John Gordon, Esq., of Hanwell, Middlesex, which lady died on the 24th March, 1852. He married, secondly, the 8th June, 1854, Lady Anne Lucy Howard, fourth daughter of William, Earl of Wicklow, M.P. He had no issue by either marriage, and his Peerage and Baronetcy become, therefore, extinct.

SIR EDMUND FILMER, BART.

SIR EDMUND FILMER, eighth Baronet, of East Sutton, Kent, was the only son of Captain Edmund Filmer, by his wife, Emilia, eldest daughter of Dr. George Skeve, and the grandson of the Rev. Sir Edmund Filmer, the sixth Baronet. He was born the 14th June, 1809, and succeeded to the Baronetcy on the demise of his uncle the Rev. Sir John Filmer, the seventh Baronet, the 15th July, 1834. He married, the 1st Sept., 1831, Helen, second daughter of David Monro, Esq., of Obsdale, and had issue two sons and three daughters. Sir Edmund was M.P. for the Western Division of Kent, from 1838 to his death; and was made a Deputy Lieutenant of that county in 1849. He died on the 8th inst., at his seat, East Sutton-place, Kent.

GENERAL BARON ROBERT FAGEL.

THE name of this veteran and esteemed diplomatist is well known in this country, not only from his residence in England, but also from the fact that his elder brother, Baron Henri Fagel, for more than thirty-five years filled the office of Ambassador from the Netherlands to the Court of St. James. Robert Fagel was the son of Henry Fagel, Secretary of State in the Netherlands, the representative of a family long distinguished for loyalty and patriotism. Robert Fagel began his military career in the campaigns of 1793 and 1794. In the following year he came over to England with the Stadtholder (later known as King William I.), of whom he was ever a devoted adherent, and whose life he had the opportunity of saving at the battle of Waterloo. Baron Robert Fagel eventually became a General of Infantry. He in 1814, went as Dutch Ambassador to the Court of the Tuileries, and remained there in that capacity until two years ago, when his great age and failing health in firmities caused him finally to relinquish a post which he had for upwards of forty years held, with high honour to himself and much advantage to his country. The Baron died at Paris on the 26th ult., at the advanced age of eighty-four. He was much beloved and respected for his many virtues and amiable qualities, both public and private. His remains have been transported to the Hague, and interred in the family vault near Scheveningen. The Baron had another brother, who was for some years an officer in the British Army.

THOMAS NEWTE, ESQ., OF DUVALE, DEVONSHIRE.

THIS respected gentleman, whose death recently occurred, was the son of Thomas Newte, Esq., of Sutton, in Surrey, and was latterly, for some time, a resident of Bologna. He had previously lived for a long period in Paris, in the enjoyment of an ample fortune, and was a member of the club "Ancien Cercle d'Etrangers" for thirty years. He had subscribed 5,000*l.* towards the relief of Ireland, which he did with undiminished honour. He possessed high intellectual and conversational powers, and was very popular in society. Mr. Newte's grandfather, Capt. Newte, accompanied Capt. Cook in his last voyage round the world. Mr. Newte was the only brother of Lady Knight Bruce, the wife of the present Lord Justice Knight Bruce.

ARTHUR PALMER, ESQ.

ARTHUR PALMER, Esq., barrister at law, late Commissioner of Bankruptcy, and Judge of the Bristol County Court who died at his residence in Clifton on the 14th ult., was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Gray's Inn the 14th May, 1821.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL THE HON. HENRY EDWARD BUTLER.

The following further information corrects some inaccuracies in the recent obituary of the gallant General. General Butler's eldest son, by his first marriage, Captain Henry Thomas Butler, who was killed at Inkerman, left a widow, but no issue. His second son, Captain Charles George Butler, 86th Regiment, did not die in the Crimea from fatigue, as stated in the obituary, but in Bombay of fever, 18th December, 1854; having married, 29th May, 1850, Jane Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the late Captain Prosser, 7th Fusiliers, by whom, who has survived him, he left issue. The eldest son by the late Charles Henry Somerset, born 5th August, 1831 (who is heir presumptive of his second cousin, the present Earl of Carrick), and Mary Emily, born 17th October, 1852, both living. The third son, Lieutenant Arthur Butler, the gallant and lamented defender of Silistria, died in 1854, unmarried. The fourth son, the Rev. Pierce Butler, did duty as military chaplain in the Crimea, and on the expedition to Kertch. He had only returned a few weeks from Silistria, where he had gone purposely to place a monument over his gallant brother's grave, when he was called upon to attend the death-bed of his noble father. The General's issue by his second marriage are Jane Hester and Edward John, both minors, who survive him.

ERRATUM.—Lieut.-General Sir Thomas Brotherton is not, as was stated, the brother of the late lamented Mr. Brotherton, M.P.; nor is he in any wise related to him.

WILLS.—The will of James Meadows Rendel, F.R.S., F.R.G.S., of Kensington Palace Gardens, has just been proved under £100,000; also the will of Sir William Cornwallis Eustace, and that of Sir William Sherlock Gooch, £50,000. General the Hon. William Henry Gardner, R.A., £14,000. Lieut.-General Thomas Morgan, H.E.I.C., £20,000.—Captain William Langdon, R.N., £10,000, and has left charitable bequests. Frederick Winslow Young, Esq., Frederick's-place, Old Jewry, £45,000. James G. Playfair, M.D., Piccadilly, £10000. The Rev. William Lashmer Bailey, Rector of Woodford, Northamptonshire, £14,000.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

THE great artistic world of England will learn with satisfaction that the Royal Academy of Arts in England elected, on Monday last, Mr. Alfred Elmore a full member of the forty select. Mr. Elmore became an exhibitor for the first time in the year 1834; brought an inchon feeling to his art; studied his calling with care in galleries at home and abroad; exhibited few pictures, and those always well considered and well rendered; was chosen an Associate of the Academy in the year 1844, immediately after the election of Mr. Cope, Mr. Dyce, and Mr. Marshall; first arrested and maintained public approbation by his thoroughly English picture of the "Invention of the Stocking-loom;" and since then, by thoughtful study, conscientious care, and a knowledge of the resources of his art, has more than justified the confidence placed in his talents by the many and the few. We will add that those who thought injustice had been done to Mr. Elmore by the Academy in electing over his head Mr. Ward and Mr. Frith are now fully satisfied. Even the many hard-working friends of Mr. Sidney Cooper will not be displeased with this wise election into the vacant forty.

Yet another bit of news touching the Royal Academy, and still the offspring of the week. Since bodies were first incorporated and chartered under Acts of Parliament there has never been, perhaps the city of London excepted, a more immovable body than the Royal Academy of Arts in London. The forty constituting the first Academy partook of the stolid qualities of the founder so admirably portrayed by Mr. Thackeray in his lecture of Tuesday last. Born Britons and chosen Academicians, they stood to their order—what that order was, old Dance, the last survivor of the first forty, could not explain, intelligent as he was, to the very last of a long life. To the first forty followed another forty, and then we believe (will actuaries tell us if we are wrong?) a third forty—all stolid and most undeniably Georgian. Rich men Chantrey and Turner—one liberal and enlightened, the other penurious and uninformed—added to this folly of the forty; then came another race (not altogether unleavened); and now (with pleasure we record the fact) the bulk of the forty have sunk the Georgian era and become—thanks to her Majesty and the Prince—an Academy of Arts with larger sympathies, and consequently fewer follies, than Chantrey and Turner sought to perpetuate in vain. But to our news. This immovable body has, after full thoughtful consideration, consented to send the diploma pictures of their defunct brethren to the Art-Treasures Exhibition at Manchester. But what are the diploma pictures? we think we can hear certain persons ask who correspond with our intelligent contemporary, Notes and Queries. The answer is easy enough. A member of the Royal Academy on his election is required to transmit and deposit a specimen of his handicraft. Some of the specimens thus sent are indifferent enough. Christie and Manson, and Sotheby and Wilkinson, would advance very little upon them; yet there are choice examples, more than enough to induce Messrs. Gambart, Graves, Agnew, and Grundy (those real patrons of art), to fill up cheques on trustworthy banks for larger amounts than the Italian Lavenue or the English Charles ever thought of giving, with all their large-heartedness, from their amplest pockets.

Lecturers are asking, "Has Sir Robert Peel sold all his turquoises?" The turquoise, it is truly said, is essentially a stone for Ambassadors to deal in. But we will not quarrel with an after-dinner lecturer; and yet we must record another saying relating to Sir Robert. The son of our great Minister (the Minister designated in our hearing by the Duke as a thoroughly-truthful man) does not tell us what he thought when he looked on the Houghton pictures at St. Petersburg. "Did romancing Sir Robert Peel think, when at St. Petersburg, that the Drayton collection of one Sir Robert would follow the Houghton collection of another Sir Robert? That the dreams of Peel of a taste in perpetuity were to be as unreal as the dreams of his predecessor in finance, Sir Robert Walpole?"

Connected with literature there is little to tell, and yet that little is worth telling. The heads of colleges at Oxford are movable like the Royal Academy. What will Magdalen and Christchurch men, and all who graduated between those learned colleges, think when they hear for the first time that Christchurch is to be open to all foundations, and that the Radcliffe Library is to be converted into a kind of Panizzi reading-room, or chapel of relief to the overstocked Bodleian? Yet that such changes will occur there can be no manner of doubt.

Artists are regretting the premature deaths of two men, skilful in their respective callings. To John Bridges, of Oxford, who died a few days ago, was given a prize for one of the best cartoons that the cartoon folly called into being. Another John—younger, and therefore more promising—has passed from among us. Mr. John Middleton, of Norwich, was a skilful scholar in the Norfolk school of landscape art. Crome and Stark would have taken him by the hand. Lord Ellesmere and Mr. Arden bought his best pictures. Who has forgotten "A Fine Day in February"? one of the Cavendish-square pictures, that judges delight to recall and valetudinarians hope to see perpetuated through the shortest month in the year.

The Committee have entrusted the selection of Photographs to be exhibited at the forthcoming Art Treasure Exhibition to Mr. Philip Delamotte, of King's College. We understand that one very important feature will be included in this department—a collection of portraits of eminent men.

WILL OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF PARIS.—The late Archbishop of Paris made a will, dated at his country house at Belle Eau, only two months before his death. This will, which was found in his desk, began with the following words: "I die in the faith and love of the Catholic Apostolic and Roman Church, for the glory of which I have never ceased to labour in the various ranks which I have filled in the sacred hierarchy." After having divided the bulk of his property, which is far from large, among his relatives, he bequeaths a pension of 1000 fr. a year to the Bishop of Tripoli's sister, as a mark of his respect for the Bishop; a few legacies to servants, and various sums to different churches and religious or charitable institutions. He leaves his mitre, his staff, and pectoral cross given to him by the Bishop of Dreux, a collection of medals commemorating the principal acts of his episcopate, and various articles of ecclesiastical attire, to the metropolitan church. He also bestows 10,000 fr. for the poor of Paris, to be distributed by the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, the Sisters of Charity, the Petites-Ecurs des Pauvres, and the Curés of all the parishes of Paris.

THE "GRETNA PRIESTHOOD."—Mr. J. Murray, of the Gretna Toll-bar, performed his last splicing operation at the close of December, and he presented the "happy couple" with an eight-day clock, a cheese, and a bottle of whisky, for, having made his fortune, he was in good humour. He is about to turn to agriculture. Mr Douglas, being enabled to retire from comfortably a handsome, has determined to handle the spade and dig. ## MUSIC.

THE season of musical activity in London has not yet arrived. The only noticeable concert of last week was the Sacred Harmonic Society's performance of Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," and Mozart's "Requiem," on Friday, the 9th inst. These two masterpieces are generally performed together, and form a most interesting evening's entertainment. Though the weather was most inclement, they drew one of the greatest audiences we have ever seen in Exeter Hall, and never on any previous occasion were so magnificently performed. The execution of the solo parts by Madame Clara Novello, Mrs. Lockey, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Lockey, was perfect; and the choruses were sung with a degree of precision and power worthy of the highest admiration. In consequence of its great success, this performance is to be repeated next week.

The preparations for the Italian Opera season are now beginning to be talked of. Mr. Gye has made what there is every reason to believe will be a lucky hit, by engaging Mdlle. Eufrosyne Parepa, the young singer who promises to be a star of the first magnitude. She has made a great impression at several of the principal theatres in Italy, and also at Lisbon and Barcelona, where she now is. She is only eighteen; has a superb soprano voice; is very beautiful; and is a charming actress both in tragedy and comedy. She will hold the place of second to Bosio. Mdlle. Plunkett is to be the principal danseuse at the Royal Italian Opera, instead of Madame Cerito.

At Her Majesty's Theatre Mdlle Piccolomini will again be the great star. Mr. Lumley has engaged a new tenor, Signor Giuglini, of whose powers and reputation in Italy the highest accounts are given

It has been repeatedly affirmed that an agreement has been concluded between the Duke of Bedford and Mr. Gye for the rebuilding of Covent-garden Theatre; and a paragraph to this effect has once more appeared. We understand, however, that whatever may hereafter be the case, no such agreement has as yet been entered into. The Royal Italian Opera this year will be located in Drury Lane.

THERE is considerable musical activity in Dublin at present. The Irish Musical Fund Society is a flourishing institution similar to our Royal Society for the Benefit of Decayed Musicians, which has, for three-quarters of a century, been of great utility had its annual concert on Friday last, when "The Messiah" was performed to a great audience, and in a magnificent manner. The principal soprano part was beautifully sung by Miss Catherine Hayes; the other solo-singers were Mr. Geary, Dr. Robinson, Mr. W. Robinson, the Misses Cruise, Mdlle Corelli, Mr. Richard Smith, and Mr. Kelly. Mr. Joseph Robinson, vicars choral of St. Patrick's and Christchurch Cathedrals was held for the purpose of paying a tribute of respect to the memory of the late Sir John Stevenson, the celebrated Irish composer, which, it had been suggested, would be most suitably accomplished by erecting a testimonial window of stained glass in St. Patrick's Cathedral. It was unanimously resolved that this suggestion should be adopted; and a committee, with the Dean of St. Patrick's at its head, was appointed to carry it into effect.—The Dublin Philharmonic Society had their second concert on Wednesday last. The principal performers were Miss Catherine Hayes Mdlle Corelli, Signor F. Lablache, Mr. Millard, Herr Oberthur, and Mr. Osborne.—Miss Hayes's concerts have drawn immense houses. The series terminates this evening.

MR. HENRY MORLEY'S ANNUAL EVENING CONCERT took place at the Lecture-hall, Greenwich, on Thursday, the 8th inst. The principal performers were Madame Clara Novello, Mrs. Lockey, Mr. J. L. Hatton, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Sims Reeves, Miss Arabella Goddard, and Herr Molique. The room was crowded in every part. Miss Arabella Goddard obtained an enthusiastic encore by her exquisite performance of Liszt's "Illustrations du Prophète;" Madame Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves were also likewise honoured in the duet "Amor possente nome." Mr. J. L. Hatton conducted with his usual skill, and sang two of his own songs, both of which were redemanded.

THE BRIXTON AMATEUR HARMONIC UNION.—A young and promising amateur musical society, which has been in existence only a few months, has just given its second concert. The first part of the programme consisted of vocal and instrumental selections from favourite operas by Rossini, Mozart, Donizetti, &c.; and the second part of a miscellaneous collection from the best masters. The orchestral music was well performed, and several vocal and instrumental pieces were admirably executed during the evening. The spacious room was crowded by the élite of the neighbourhood, and the applause with which they received the performances evinced the gratification the concert had afforded them.

ST. MARTINS HALL.—AMERICAN LITERATURE.—The Rev. E. G. Holland commenced a course of three lectures on this subject on Thursday week, when he discoursed eloquently and well on his native poets and poetry, from the first traces of both to the present time. On Wednesday last he dealt with the romance-writers of the United States. His lecture evinced research, some personal knowledge of the scene of love of story-telling, and the truth and life expected from the novelist, who follows in the track of those Oriental teachers that, not by abstractions, but by concrete embodiments and impersonations, instructed the childhood of the race. The romancist, nevertheless, must control the childhood of the race. The romancist, nevertheless, must control the childhood of the race. The romancist, nevertheless, must control

NEW CHAPEL AT HOBART TOWN.

r the Colonial Times, lately received, is recorded the laying of the undation-stone of this new Congregational Chapel, in Davey-street, obart Town, on the 30th of July last. Although the weather was favourable, there were present on the ground from three to four ndred persons, including ministers, the elder children belonging to e Collins-street Sabbath-school, besides the congregation usually sembling at Collins-street Chapel.

A platform was erected near the foundation-stone, covered with gs; and a temporary gallery was provided for the choir. The plans d sections of the intended structure were exhibited on the platform. he booming of the guns from the battery, in honour of the ratifica- on of Peace, prevented the inauguration of the proceedings for a few inutes after the appointed time, the hour of noon. The Rev. G. larke announced that the proceedings would be commenced by sing- g "The Sanctus," which was done by the children and choir in xcellent style. The Rev. J. M. Strongman, of New Town, read the 33rd Psalm. The Rev. F. Miller (minister of the Independent Chapel, risbane street) offered prayer for the Divine blessing on the business f the day, and for the prosperity of the minister and congregation ttending to worship in the proposed new chapel. The Rev. G. Clarke hen, as minister, came forward and addressed the assembly in an mpressive manner.

H. Hopkins, Esq., J.P., proceeded to lay the foundation-stone. An scription (contained in a bottle hermetically sealed), beautifully en- rossed on parchment, was deposited in the recess left for the purpose. Ir. Hopkins having spread the mortar, the stone was lowered into its roper position, the mallet was applied, and Mr. Hopkins delivered an ddress, in which he referred to the time of his first arrival in this olony, when there was only one small building used by their friends s Wesleyans, and that for Roman Catholic worship close by; these were the only buildings for worship in the colony at that time; but he ould now see upwards of a hundred places of worship, the greater art of which were erected by voluntary contributions. Prayers were hen said, the Doxology was sung, and the impressive ceremony ter- minated.

A refection was then served at Mr. Butler's new store, Salamanca- lace, in the vicinity of the site; at the conclusion of which the Revs. Messrs. Clarke, Poore, Miller, Wade, and Waterfield, and Messrs Hop- ins, Tiffin, and Pretty, severally addressed the meeting.

The chapel is intended for the use of the church and congregation nder the pastorate of the Rev. G. Clarke. When completed it will be ne of the handsomest edifices of the kind in Hobart Town. The esign is by Messrs. Tiffin and Davidson, of Macquarie-street. The tyle is Early English. The façade consists of a tower and broach pire (96 feet high in the clear), with an entrance by one deeply- ecessed doorway opening into the porch entrance. The chapel will onsist of a nave, two aisles, a chancel, and vestry; school-rooms are esigned to be built at the back. The roof will be open-timbered, onsisting entirely of hard wood, boarded and slated, supported by ave piers formed of eight alternated clustered and octagonal columns. The pulpit will be of cedar, handsomely carved. The chancel will be lighted by a three-light pointed window filled with stained glass. The building throughout will be of freestone, from the quarry at Risdon; and, as far as practicable, colonial material alone is to be used in its construction. It is expected that the edifice will be ready for the opening services about July next. The cost will be under £5000. The new chapel will contain no pews, but open benches (cedar) only, and will comprise sittings for about 700 persons.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

BROADCLOTH MANUFACTORY, CRANBROOK, KENT.

THE town of Cranbrook, situated in the centre of the Weald of Kent, was once the heart of the clothing trade introduced by the Flemings, whom the policy of Edward III. induced to settle in this county, where the broadcloth manufacture was concentrated and carried on for centuries, previous to the introduction of machinery in other parts of the kingdom. The inventors had no respect for places or persons, but settled with centralising effect in districts which, from various causes, were likely to assimilate better with the mighty changes the new mode was sure to bring about. But in this locality, though now so bereft of anything approaching to manufacture that such a thing seems almost a legend or a myth of the older inhabitants when they speak of it, yet the cloth manufacture was at one period held in high repute; and Hasted, the historian of Kent, states that it was of so much consequence, and in such estimation, that the greatest landowners in the Weald followed this business, and nearly all the ancient families, some of which are now ennobled, sprang from, and owe their titles to, ancestors who followed this great staple occupation.

To show the importance in which it was held at one time, it is related that Queen Elizabeth, in one of her progresses through the county, visited Cranbrook, and, after inspecting the cloth works, walked to Coursehorne Manor, a mile distant, the seat of the family of the Hendleys or Henley, entirely upon broadcloth.

Our Illustration shows part of what was years ago one of the principal cloth manufactories at Cranbrook, the buildings extending some distance down the main street of the town, which have from time to time been removed to give place to more compact and comfortable dwelling-houses. These remains are not unpicturesque; in which respect they have the advantage over the factory buildings by which they have been superseded.

THE RIGHT REV. DR. BICKERSTETH, THE NEW BISHOP OF RIPON.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY SHARPE AND MELVILLE.

Since the removal of the cloth manufacture to the north and west of England, Cranbrook has been a mart for the agricultural produce of the neighbourhood, especially hops.

THE NEW BISHOP OF RIPON.

THE consecration of the Right Rev. Dr. Bickersteth, the newly appointed Bishop of Ripon, will take place this day in the minster of that diocese.

The parishioners of St. Giles's, and the poor especially, feel that by Dr. Bickersteth's removal, they have parted from an affectionate, zealous, and truly Christian pastor; and an expression of the general feeling of the parish was recorded at a meeting convened on Tuesday last of the joint vestry of St. Giles's and St. George's, Bloomsbury, when it was resolved unanimously—

That this Vestry desire to tender their warmest congratulations to Dr. Bickersteth on his appointment by the Crown to the Bishopric of Ripon. That, whilst the experience they have gained of the faithfulness, wisdom, and unvarying kindness with which Dr. Bickersteth has discharged the duties of his ministerial office makes them deeply sensible of the loss which the parishes will sustain by his removal, yet they cannot but feel that the interests of the Church of Christ have been well consulted in the appointment to the Episcopate of one who reflects so truly, in his private and public character, the principles and practice of the Reformed Church of England.

Dr. Bickersteth is a man of striking figure, commanding manners, and energetic delivery; his style of preaching is very impressive; and his appointment to the episcopal bench will, doubtless, give peculiar satisfaction to his diocese, and to the country at large. The following outline of the Bishop's antecedents will prove that he is entitled to the confidence and respect both of clergy and laity.

The Right Rev. Dr. Robert Bickersteth was born at Acton, in Suffolk, in August 1816. His father was the Rev. John Bickersteth, then Vicar of that parish, and afterwards Rector of Sapcote, Leicestershire, and Rural Dean, who died in October of last year. He is a nephew of the late Lord Langdale, Master of the Rolls; and of the late Rev. Edward Bickersteth, so well known as the author of many religious works. He is a member of Queen's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1841: he was ordained by the Bishop of Peterborough the same year, and for some time assisted his father as Curate of Sapcote. He afterwards accepted the Curacy of the parish church of Reading; and thence removed to Clapham, where he was Curate of the parish church, as well as for some time Lecturer at the Chapel of the Magdalen Hospital, until, a vacancy occurring in St John's Church, Clapham Rise, he was appointed to the Incumbency of that church by Dr. Dealtry. His labours in that district were so highly appreciated by a large and influential congregation, that it was with much difficulty he could be persuaded to accept the Rectory of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, offered to him by Lord Truro, simply on the ground of his well-known talents and supposed ability to take the charge of that large and important parish. On the great deterioration in the value of that Rectory by the operation of the new London Burial Act, to the amount of nearly £1000 a year, as alluded to by the Bishop of London in the House of Lords, Lord Chancellor Cranworth, to make some amends to Mr. Bickersteth for so serious a diminution of income, presented him to the Canonry of Salisbury, vacant by the election of Dr. Hamilton to that See. During the time of his charge of the arduous parish of St. Giles, as well as in all his previous cures, where he is still remembered with the greatest affection, the highest testimony has been borne, by all persons acquainted with the facts, to Dr. Bickersteth's administrative talents, united with the higher qualifications of a Christian pastor. He has thus been for fourteen years not only a distinguished preacher, but in various spheres a laborious and successful parish priest. Added to his parochial engagements he was for some years a constant contributor to and editor of a religious periodical; and has published some volumes of sermons of a practical character, and several smaller works—one especially on the habitations of the London poor, which has stimulated many persons to the erection of the model lodging-houses so beneficial to the working classes of the metropolis. He has also been the editor of several biographical works published by Messrs. Seeley. He has taken a prominent part in the working and management of many of the leading religious societies of the Church, and it is difficult to imagine any person better qualified to sympathise with the difficulties and direct the energies of the body of clergy committed to his charge, or more likely to uphold the cause of the Church of England in the Legislature. In 1846 he married Elizabeth, daughter of Joseph Garde, Esq., of Cork, and sister of Rev. R. Garde, Vicar of Harrold, Bedfordshire, by whom he has a family of five children. The venerable Edward Bickersteth, Archdeacon of Buckingham, is brother to the new Bishop; and the Rev. Lawrence Ottley, the Rector of Richmond, is his Lordship's brother-in-law.

The statement which has been made by some of our contemporaries to the effect that the new Bishop of Ripon was a member of the College of Surgeons, and Licentiate of Apothecaries' Hall, is totally incorrect. Mr Bickersteth studied medicine for a short period in London, but relinquished all idea of entering the medical profession long before he was of a sufficient age to become a candidate for the diploma of the College or the license of the Hall.

PORTION OF AN OLD BROADCLOTH MANUFACTORY, CRANBROOK, KENT

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE Inspector-General of Infantry (Sir Colin Campbell) has ordered that every sub-altern in the British Army of less than two years' service shall be required to fill up and return a monthly report of the state of his regiment to the officer commanding the depôt.

THE Racoon, 21, one of the new description of screw corvettes now being built at Chatham, is progressing very fast, and is expected to be ready for launching in the ensuing spring. Her vessel has for some time past been occupied in fitting the Charybdis, 21, will be fitted with machinery 400-horse power.

A NEW 36-gun frigate, to be called the Mersey, has been commenced at Chatham Dockyard. She is laid down in the new slip from which the Leander formerly was launched some years since. The Mersey will be one of the longest frigates in the service, it being intended to construct her upwards of 300 feet in length.

AN order has been issued from the War Department by which the various barrack sergeants all over the United Kingdom are authorised to draw a daily ration from the several contractors, subject to the same conditions as respect the rest of the troops. In all future contracts this order is to be made compulsory.

THE head quarters of the Army Works Corps, under Sir Joseph Paxton, removed on Monday from the offices in Whitehall-yard to 3, Spring-gardens, the premises recently occupied being it is said, intended for Lieut.-General Sir Colin Campbell, the Inspector-General of Infantry.

THE British fleet in commission on the 1st of January, 1857, numbered 261 ships, 5076 guns, and 48,794 men as compared with the last year of the war, Jan. 1856, numbering 341 ships, 6231 guns, and 63 335 men. The ships on the East India station have been increased, while those in the Mediterranean have been diminished in number. The difference between the war and peace fleet, excepting the steam frigates, is a reduction of 64 ships, 1155 guns, and 14,537 seamen, marines, and boys.

A CIRCULAR has been issued making some slight alterations regarding the undress uniform of the Army. The tuft of the men's stores cap is to be dispensed with, and the cap is to be worn by all infantry except light infantry and rifle regiments, which are to be of the same colour as the forage-cap—viz., green. Chin straps are to be worn peaks only to be used on the stations prescribed by regulation. The men's stocks are to be worn by all light infantry and fusilier regiments are to bear the Arabic numerals, surmounted by a bugle or grenade, as the case may be; the officers in embroidery, the men's in brass, as by pattern lodged at the Clothing Department. The knapsacks of all regiments are to have the numbers in Arabic numerals, 1½ inches in height, painted in white in the centre of the pack.

THE FILIBUSTERS IN NICARAGUA.—A letter from San José (Costa Rica), under date of December 3, says:—'Martial law has been proclaimed at San José. This measure has produced great public excitement, but has not to any considerable result. Upwards of 600 men has been sent to the San Juan river to prevent the passage of the steamer and another 500 will leave to-day to reinforce Canas at Rivas. Walker after losing 300 in the skirmishes at Masaya, which took place two years ago. A wealthy man from the Brazils, named Ruetter, brought a hide slave to Berlin but the latter left him in order to learn a trade. M. Ruetter claims him before the law courts in his property, but failed from being unable to hand in proof in support of his claim. In order to prevent a recurrence of such an incident the matter has been brought before the Chambers in the manner above stated.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

GREAT inactivity has prevailed in the market for all National Stocks and Securities this week but without leading to any material change in the quotations. The purchases of Stock both for Money and Time, have been more limited than for some time past. The news from India being unfavourable as regards the exchanges—those at Bombay showing an advance of 2 at Calcutta 1½ per cent—the East India Company have advanced the rates at which they will draw bills upon the various Presidencies and Settlements, but a threat of war movement has not been without its effect upon the Discount Market. The Bank Directors have made no change in their rates; but in London-street great difficulty has been experienced in procuring money under six per cent, and the supply has been wholly inadequate to meet the wants of the commercial body. From a return just issued it appears that the Bullion imported from India and specie from Bengal—exclusive of the large quantities forwarded to France viz. Bordeaux and Dover—were £17 606 840 against £1 124 040 in 1855. From the Mediterranean £1 026 480 in silver and £3 700 in gold from the present appearance of the market there is every prospect of large quantities of gold being sent to purchase silver.

Numerous frauds though not of an extensive nature have been discovered upon some of our public companies With a view of arresting speculative transactions in shares, &c on the part of clerks and other parties the Committee of the Stock Exchange have adopted a resolution enlarging members against such transactions without the knowledge of third parties. His resolution confines payment with a cheque countersigned in the event of greater caution not being shown by the members of the Exchange Out of the £400 000 in gold lately received from Australia only about £200 000 has been sold to the Bank the remainder having been sent to Paris The withdrawals of gold this week have been trifling From all quarters including arrivals from Australia only about £200 000 The importations have been under £80 000

The Continental exchanges have undergone very little change of late.

The call of £75 per share upon the unsubscribed shareholders in the Royal British Bank has resulted in the refusal of a large number of persons to pay the amount.

On Monday business was much restricted in the Stock Exchange, and a slight fall took place in the value of Consols Other securities were dull :—Bank Stock realised 215, 217½ ; the Three per Cents Reduced were 94¾ 3/4; Three per Cent Consols for Money 93¾ down to 93¾ 5/8 Consols for Account, 94¾, 94¾ ; New Three per Cents 93¾ ¼, India Bonds were put to as premium, Exchequer Bills 19s to 22s premium, Exchequer Bonds 98¾ 99 Several fluctuations took place in prices on Tuesday when the following quotations were marked :—Reduced Three per Cents 93¾ ¾ ; New Three per Cents, 93¾ 94¼ ; Consols for Money 93¾ ¾ ; Ditto for Account 93¾ ¾ ; Long Annuities, 1859, 2 11-16 ; India Bonds par to 3s prem. ; Exchequer Bills, par to 4s. prem; Exchequer Bonds 99 and 98¾ On the following day only limited purchases of stock were made on the part of the public; nevertheless, prices were steady :—Bank Stock was 216 and 217½ The Three per Cents Reduced marked 93½ ¾ ; Consols for Money, 93¾ ¾ ; Ditto for Account 93¾ ¾ ; New Three per Cents, 94 ¼ ; New Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 76¾ ; Long Annuities 1885 13-16 ; India Stock, 220 219 and 221 ; Exchequer Bills, 2s. 4s to 2s. prem ; Exchequer Bonds 99 99 On Thursday the Stock Market was somewhat firmer, and a slight advance took place in the quotations :—The Three per Cents for Money were 93¾ ¾ ¾ for the Account, 94 to 94¼ ; the New Three per Cents marked 94 to 94¼ ; and the Reduced, 93¾ to 94¼. The Thirty Years' Annuities realised 13 1-16. Exchequer Bills were very dull, at 2s. dis. to 2s prem. ; Bank Stock, 217½ ; India Stock, 220 to 221.

The dealings in the Foreign House have been very restricted, and prices almost generally have shown a tendency to give way. A meeting of Venezuelan bondholders has been held, and resolutions have been passed authorising the Spanish-American Committee to withdraw from further negotiation with the Commissioners lately arrived from the Republic. It was further determined to send a Commissioner to Caracas, to arrange terms with the Government. Mexican Three per Cents realised 21¼ ; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 83¼ ; Portuguese Three per Cents, 43¾ ex div.

All Joint-Stock Bank Shares have been rather dull, as follows :—Bank of Egypt, 18¾ ; English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered, 16¾ ; London and County, 33½ ; Ottoman, 13¾ ; New South Wales, 49¾ ; Union of Australia, 64¾ ; Union of London, 28½ ; Unity Mutual, 40¾ ; Western of London, 43¾.

Miscellaneous Securities, generally, have been heavy, and rather droopy as to price :—Australian Agricultural have marked 2¼ ; Canada Government Six per Cents 103½ ex. div. ; Crystal Palace, 2¾ ; Ditto, Preference, 5¾ ; Electric Telegraph, 4¾ ; English and Australian Copper Company, 7¾ ; General Screw Steam Shipping Company, 6¾ ; National Discount Company, 6 . New South Wales Government Debentures, 105¾ ; North British Australasian, ¾ , North of Europe Steam, 14 ; Oriental Gas 1¾ , Peel River Land and Mineral, 2¾ ; Peninsular and Oriental Steam, 66¾ ; Ditto, New, 14¾ . Berlin Waterworks have been done at 5¾ ; East London, 113 ; Grand Junction, 75 , Kent, 81 ; London, 95 , West Middlesex, 101. Derby Canal, 480 ; Midland and Worcester, 440 ; Regent 8, 18¾ ; Loughborough, 550 ; and Southampton Dock, 49.

Nearly all Railway shares have been dull, and prices have ruled lower. The following are the chief quotations current this morning :—

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, January 12 Only a limited supply of English wheat was on sale to-day a market For most kinds we had rather a slow inquiry, but generally last week's prices were supported For foreign wheats were to improved request, at full quotations Bad milling parcels were scarcely saleable to-day Flour was in good demand, at full currencies quoted Fine malting barley sold readily, at a further improvement as value of inferior and middling qualities was unaltered former terms Low kinds were steady to-day Trade at the close of which was reasonably good—at full currencies Scotch oats moved off steadily, other kinds slowly, at previous quotations Beans, peas, and flour were tolerably firm but not dearer.

Imports of foreign supplies of produce on to-day's market were only moderate. Generally speaking, the trade was in a sluggish state, at Monday's currencies.

THE LATE CAPTAIN MONTRIOU, OF THE INDIAN NAVY.

THIS meritorious officer, who had served continuously for thirty-two years in the service of Government in India, died of cholera on the 29th of April last, at his residence in Colabah; and by a squadron order of the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Henry Leeke, the remains of Captain Montriou were followed to the grave by the officers and seamen of the ships in port, and the officers of the dockyard establishment at Bombay.

In the Bombay Telegraph and Courier Captain Montriou is characterised as a very superior officer. "He had served in the first Rangoon war, and got a medal for it. He took a prominent share in all the East India Company's maritime surveys round by Bengal, and he was allowed to be the first surveyor of the service to which he belonged. In 1839 he came round to Bombay, and commanded the receiving-ship Hastings, and was acting draughtsman as well for some years. In this position he became a great favourite with the late Sir Robert Oliver; and he was in such good favour with seamen that he had often from three to four hundred European sailors in his ship, and by this means he made up the war complements of the ships and steamers equipped for the China war. He planned and wrote out the whole of the ordnance equipment required for the vessels of the Indian navy, and was a general referee from the highest official quarters respecting professional matters afloat; and there are few men that he could not cope with in scientific acquirements. His manner was so retired and unassuming that he never gave offence to any one, but at the same time he had a high and noble spirit, and was most warm-hearted and generous to those about him. From 1847 to 1851 he was in charge of the observatory, and he discharged the duties required of him with great ability.

"At his own request he was relieved of these duties. The Government then gave him a more lucrative appointment—namely, senior naval officer at Aden. Here he on several occasions distinguished himself in the boat attacks on the Arabs, and co-operating with the Resident for the welfare of the port, and he was constantly consulted by the Resident in political matters, on account of his great tact, learning, and experience. But at Aden private misfortunes and family bereavements told so heavily upon him as to break up his heretofore strong constitution; and, as a crowning woe to all his bitterness, and to a long and distressing illness, he was burnt out of house and home, and he and his wife and child were left utterly destitute of everything except the clothes they had on when rescued from the flames. Their case, pitiable as it was, unfortunately proved to be one which Government had no power or inclination to assist them in, and on this occasion he lost property to the amount of Rs. 26,000. He, therefore, had to begin life anew, and on his return to Bombay was given the command of the Queen, in which he realised sufficient to set up and furnish a house again. After this he commanded the Punjaub, and in 1855 was nominated Master Attendant and Captain of the Port, but since he lost his all by fire at Aden his constitution never recovered the shock.

"His total ruin by this sad event so embarrassed his affairs that he actually had it not in his power to visit England for the recovery of his health. His whole career has been one of usefulness and honourable distinction. He, we believe, also drew up the report for the Committee of the House of Commons respecting the surveys of the East India Company. He leaves a wife and two sons and two daughters to lament his loss; and it is to be hoped that the Government will, in respect to such an old, worthy, and faithful servant, recommend his family to the consideration of the Court of Directors.

THE PUNJAUB.

THE intelligence from this extensive territory on the north-west of India is at this moment especially interesting, from the movement of troops thence towards the seat of our war with Persia.

In the despatch received in anticipation of the Overland Mail it is stated that the force under Brigadier Chamberlayne had nearly reached Cabul. The Bombay Times of Dec. 3 contained the following:—

"An army of 5000 men has for some time past been advancing by the hills of Kohat in the direction of Cabul—so quietly that we hardly knew anything of the proceedings till a letter from an officer with the force made us aware that they had got within fifty miles of the capital of the Ameer without knowing the object or destination of their dispatch. Sir John Lawrence was about to proceed to meet Dost Mahomed in person.

"This force, when last heard of, had marched through the Meeranzie Valley to Thull, sixty miles from Kohat, and 180 from Cabul. Moving onwards from Thull it crossed the river Koorum and entered the valley of that name, still keeping on the great road to Cabul.

The accompanying view upon one of the six rivers of the Punjaub presents a good specimen of the varied scenery of the country. The Ravee, upon whose bank this view has been sketched, rises in Kulu, on the declivity of a mountain called Bungull, and a short distance west of the Rotang Pass. The following details are from Thornton's valuable Gazetteer of India:—

At the distance of about forty miles from the source, in a south-westerly direction, the Ravee is joined by two feeders, the Nye and the Boodhil—the latter taking its rise in a lake called Munee Mahees, regarded as sacred by the superstitious Hindoos. Where surveyed by Cunningham, four or five miles from Burmawur, at an elevation of about 7000 feet, it was found 116 feet wide. At Chamba, about twenty miles below, and south-west of this place, or 100 miles from its source, according to the statement of Vigne, the Ravee is crossed by a bridge. Forster states that it is there "forty or fifty yards broad, and fordable at most seasons of the year." At Bisuli, to which the downward course is about twenty-five miles due west, Forster found it, early in April, about 120 yards wide, very rapid, and unfordable. The statement of Vigne's is less explicit—"I have been terrified over the Ravi at Bisuli once during the rainy season, when it was swelled to a roaring torrent, and once, again, in winter, when its passage upon buffalo-hides. Its width is about eighty yards." From Bisuli, in lat. 32 deg. 34 min., long. 75 deg. 48 min., the Ravee takes a south-westerly direction, which it generally holds for the rest of its course. Macartney found it, at Meanee ferry, on the route from Amritsir to Vazeerabad, and about 185 miles from its source, to have, at the beginning of August, and at its time of fullest water, a breadth of 312 yards, and a depth of twelve feet, where greatest. The deep channel was between thirty and forty feet in breadth, the rest of the waterway having a depth of from three to five feet. In the cold season, when it was the water in no part more than four feet deep. Moorcroft describes it at Lahore, about twenty miles lower down, as divided into three different streams or branches. These, he states, are "separated, in the dry weather, by intervals of half a mile, but in the rainy season the two most easterly branches are united, and form an expansive and rapid stream." "The two first branches are fordable, but the third, which is the principal one, has a ferry." He remarks, that the boats on the Ravee were the largest and best-built that he has seen in India. Burnes, who navigated the Ravee from its confluence with the Chenaub to Lahore, says it "is very small, and resembles a canal, rarely exceeding 150 yards in breadth in any part of its course. Its banks are precipitous, so that it deepens before it expands. Nothing can exceed the crookedness of its course, which is a great impediment to navigation, for we often found ourselves, after half a day's sail, within two miles of the spot from which we started. The water of the Ravee is redder than that of the Chenaub. It is fordable in most places for eight months in the year." From Lahore, its course south-west, measured according to the main direction of the stream, to its confluence with the Chenaub, is about 200 miles, but along all the sinuosities, 250

THE authorities of the War Department have, we understand, determined to increase the force of the Commissariat officers on the China station, orders having been issued that a number of persons connected with that branch of the army shall hold themselves in immediate readiness to embark for Hong-Kong

THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL SIR JOHN MALCOLM.*

"There cannot be found in the history of Europe," said Mr. Canning, "the existence of any monarchy which, within a given time, has produced so many men of the first talent in civil and military life as India has first trained for herself and then given to their native country." Eminent among those worthies was Sir John Malcolm, who, during fifty years, served his country with honour, judgment, and usefulness, both as a soldier and a diplomatist. His history of Persia is a standard work, and his volumes on India are manuals for Oriental statesmen. He enjoyed the personal friendship of some of the most illustrious men of the age in which he flourished. The King of Persia esteemed him more than any other European who had visited his Court. Mehemet Ali, the enlightened Pacha of Egypt, admired his character and appreciated his talents. British and foreign scholars bore testimony to his literary abilities. In all the relations of private life his conduct was admirable. His biographer has done justice to his memory, not by writing a panegyric, but by recording his actions. The extended correspondence of Malcolm with his contemporaries—the leading men of his day acting on troubled scenes—is the best evidence of his high qualities; and the ninth chapter of the second volume of this biography will be the most exacting reader of his intimate knowledge of Indian politics, and of the profound sagacity he brought to bear on even the most minute details of that complicated empire.

* "The Life and Correspondence of Major-General Sir John Malcolm G.C.B." By John William Kaye. Smith, Elder, and Co.

John Malcolm was born on the 2nd of Mr. 1769, on the banks of the Esk, in Dumfriesshire. He had nine brothers and seven sisters. Through the influence of his maternal uncle, Mr. John Pasley, an eminent London merchant, he obtained a cadetship at the early age of twelve. His extreme youth rendered his acceptance by the Directors very doubtful. One of them said to him, "Why, my little man, what would you do if you were to meet Hyder Ali?" "I would out with my sword and cut off his head." "You will do," was the rejoinder; "let him pass." The anecdote is worth preserving, as it proves the bold spirit of the boy, and also shows the small requirements demanded in those days by the magnates of Leadenhall-street in the choice of their servants. Young Malcolm landed at Madras in 1783, and was sent to do duty at Vellore with one of the regiments in garrison at that fortress. Of his early career there are no records. He appears to have been extravagant, and soon encumbered with debts; but his wild oats were quickly sown, and he diligently commenced the study of the native languages. As a Lieutenant he joined Lord Cornwallis's camp before Seringapatam, and was there appointed Persian interpreter to the troops serving with the Nizam. "John Malcolm," says his biographer, "had now planted his foot on the ladder, and from this time to the close of his career he was uninterruptedly employed on the staff." After twelve years' absence he visited England, and on his return was present at the capture of the Cape of Good Hope by Sir Alured Clarke, who was shortly afterwards appointed Commander-in-Chief in India, when he selected Malcolm as his secretary; but the young officer was soon transferred to a similar post under Lord Harris, who had received the command of the coast army at Madras. Malcolm had diligently studied the habits, manners, and policy of the native States of India, and when the Marquis Wellesley arrived, as Governor-General, forwarded to that nobleman the results of his observations through his private secretary. They were so favourably received that the writer was at once preferred to the Residency of Hyderabad. From this period he won, and ever retained, the friendship of the Marquis Wellesley and of his brother, Arthur Wellesley, Duke of Wellington. Under these favouring auspices Malcolm's first exploit in Oriental diplomacy was the conduct of the negotiations by which the French troops in the service of the Nizam were disbanded—a delicate operation, in which he was quite successful. Then followed the rupture with Tippoo and the capture of Seringapatam, when Malcolm was placed on the commission for settling the conquered territory of Mysore. The mission to Persia followed. On his return Arthur Wellesley gained the important Battle of Assaye against Scindiah, and General Lake broke the power of that Mahratta Prince at Lasswaree. Alighur, Delhi, and Agra fell before the battalions of that veteran soldier, who was rewarded with a peerage for his brilliant victories.

Up to this period Malcolm's career had been passed in the sunshine of patronage; he was now to experience the mortifications attendant upon high office, and the penalties attached to responsibility. On him devolved the arrangement of the terms of peace with Scindiah; and he thought it just that in good faith that Prince ought to retain the fortress of Gwalior; but the Marquis Wellesley was a great advocate of territorial extension through conquest, and was highly indignant at the yielding spirit of the negotiator. Malcolm, it must be remembered, was only a subordinate diplomatic agent, and was bound to execute the orders of his superior, however repugnant to his feelings and judgment. In one of his letters, in which he endeavoured to justify himself against the charge of disobedience, he said that his only object was "the promotion of the public interests." On reading the letter the Marquis underscored those words, and appended to them this note in the margin:—"Mr. Malcolm's duty is to obey my orders and enforce my instructions. I will look after the public interests." But, however incensed the Marquis might be, the first burst of irritation was past he wrote a letter to Malcolm which effected a complete reconciliation.

Lord Cornwallis, returning a second time to supreme power in India, superseded the Marquis Wellesley. He opposed and reversed the policy of his predecessor, he extended the territories of Scindiah, and maintained the rights of the native Princes. In this spirit he restored Gwalior to Scindiah, and desired to abandon all our territory and alliances westward of the Jumna. But death abruptly terminated his meritorious career, and, as an instance in the curious vicissitudes of life, it may be observed that the mortal remains of this most excellent man were deposited in an unconsecrated grave on the banks of the Ganges. He was succeeded by Sir George Barlow, whose character was quite opposed to that of Malcolm, though the new Governor fully appreciated the knowledge and zeal of the soldier statesman.

John Malcolm had now acquired large experience, and was quite capable of forming an accurate judgment on points of delicacy. On the invidious preference given to the Crown officers over those of the Company he had formed a very decided opinion, and as the late war in the Crimea afforded proof that the authorities at the Horse Guards still adhere to the old routine, which may be attended with disadvantage if we are involved in a protracted contest with Persia, it may be well to place Malcolm's views here on record. The following extracts are taken from his letter to Colonel Stanton, dated Mysore, 1807:—

> The service has always been depressed, and particularly of late, owing to the great influx of King's troops, amongst whom there must be men of higher rank and interest than there are in the Company's service; but neither of these qualifications, nor even that of knowledge or experience, and by the latter this empire can alone be kept. The Company's officers must, therefore (generally speaking), be the great instruments of its preservation; and the highest proof of rank and consideration from England can have must have its origin in liberality of sentiment and natural discernment that enables him to employ with confidence, and successfully, those whose local information renders them peculiarly fit for the service. This remark applies from the Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief to a Lieutenant-Colonel of a new-raised corps just landed on the beach. The general Company's officer filling these stations higher in India to which every other British subject has a right to look is their want of natural rank and distinction, and consequently of that support and confidence which every officer placed in stations of great responsibility should have from the Government he serves. This injury is the fruit of injustice, and they are disqualified from all hopes of attaining those stations to which their rank is entitled by the occupation of their [illegible] peculiarly fitted, because they have been kept from attaining it public notice and those honours to which their services were entitled [illegible] of a servile disposition, and their keenness in this [illegible] as a convincing proof of the lowness of their ambition [illegible] consequent unfitness for anything beyond that subordinate [illegible] ahorious drudgery for the reputation of others to which they have been hitherto dest[illegible].

In May, Government M[illegible] despatched Mr. Elphinstone on a second [illegible] Ambassador to the Court of Teheran, in the person of Sir Harford [illegible] and the contest of etiquett involving the claims to relative [illegible] is Majesty and the Envoy of [illegible] illustrated all useful necrotitation. But Malcolm's views on Persia and Russia are clearly indicated in a letter which he addressed to Count Woronzoff; and at this crisis our readers will be gratified at being put into possession of his thoughts:—

> The desire [illegible] of unsettled provinces that [illegible] your motives for int[illegible] the north-western parts of Persia being disturbed, [illegible] see in any troubles that disturb the southern and eastern parts of that kingdom a check to our profitable trade with the Gulf, and dis[illegible] communication across the Arras (whatever be the professed ob[illegible] approximation to our possessions in the East. That all this will [illegible] by honour I have no doubt. Besides the natural action of a great military empire, there is (as my whole life has given me an opportunity of observing an impelling power upon civilisation when in contact with barbarism that cannot be resisted. These combined causes will bring Russia forward; and there is no nation more constitutionally jealous than one which, like Great Britain, has its greatness in a considerable degree grounded upon extended commerce.

Malcolm then observes:—

> I have never entered into the irrational project of an invasion of India. I have always been of opinion that the obstacles were of a magnitude that must prevent its ever being carried into execution.

He then alludes to the impediments against the hopes of such a conquest in these terms:—

> The actual state of the British power in India must baffle all predatory efforts; and before a regular, well-supported invasion could be attempted, a line of communication must be made through countries which are, generally speaking, either desolate or inhabited by the most rude and barbarous tribes of the universe. These, as a part of the plan, must be civilised—no slight undertaking. And, after all, supposing an enormous sacrifice of wealth, and of the [illegible] brought their victorious standards to Delhi—that they had [illegible] proposed to Bonaparte to ravage the Mogul in his grandmother's garters—what would they do next? Where march? How would they manage the country? Could they rely on the native Princes—all the turbulent tribes whom they had conquered from the English rule? Can it ever occur to any man in his senses that India is either worth conquering, or can be preserved, by any nation that does not possess the superiority at sea?

Under the Indian Government of Lord Moira, afterwards Marquis of Hastings, Malcolm was appointed Governor-General's Agent in the Deccan and Bricadier General in which character he joined Sir Thomas Hislop's army, and highly distinguished himself at the Battle of Mehidpoor, which annihilated the power of Holkar. The next find him wisely administering the affairs of Central India. As the reward of his long and active career, he aspired to the high office of Governor-General, but did not obtain that golden prize. However he received the appointment of Governor of Bombay, and, on his return to England, was nominated the representative in Parliament of the Duke of Newcastle for his Grace's borough of Launceston. He opposed the Reform Bill, and was a Tory from conviction. He died in 1833. His statue (by Chantrey) stands in Westminster Abbey; and his monument on Langholm Hill, fronting the Border, erected by his countrymen of Eskdale, commemorates his fame.

Mr. Kaye has done justice to Sir John Malcolm. His volumes are highly instructive, ranging as they do over a most interesting period of history, crowded with exciting events, and illustrated by the actions of statesmen and soldiers to whom England and India owe a large debt of gratitude. Those readers who are not tired of reading about Waterloo and its results we recommend a perusal of the third chapter of the second volume. In the eleventh chapter of the same volume we see Malcolm as a literary man, surrounded by congenial spirits, at Hyde Hall, and gladly accompany him on his second visit to Paris, and listen to his reflections on Bonaparte's marshals, Louis XVIII., and the French savans.

THE GORTON INSTITUTE.

The first anniversary of the establishment of a literary and educational institution at the Gorton Locomotive Works, near Manchester, was celebrated by a soiree at the Free Trade Hall, on the 8th inst. Mr. Edward Watson, the manager of the Sheffield Railway, presided. The institution was established by the workmen in the employ of the railway company at Gorton; and the somewhat extensive character of the present commemoration, which concluded with a ball, was due to the liberality of Mr. Watkin, who is the president of the institute. Between two and three thousand persons, comprising the employés of the Sheffield Company, with their families and friends, were assembled by invitation, and on the platform were many influential guests from various parts of the country.

After performances on the organ, and by a party of glee-singers, the report of the first year's progress was read by Mr. M'Donald, the secretary of the institution. It stated that the institution was established, on the invitation of the railway directors, who offered the [illegible] buildings, by the subscription of 1s. 6d. per month, 760 of whom resolved to tax themselves for this object, by the deduction of one penny per week from the earnings of each man receiving less than 20s. per week, and of 1½d. per week from the wages of those who earned 20s. or upwards. The proceeds of these subscriptions, about £180 per annum, were appropriated one third to the schools, and two-thirds to the reading room. There were now in the schools 300 girls and 400 boys, whose progress was considered satisfactory. A library of 1200 volumes had been provided by the liberality of individuals connected with the company, particularly the Earl of Harrowby and Mr. Watkin, and there was still a balance of £71 for further purchases. The position and prospects of the institution generally were regarded as gratifying and encouraging.

The Chairman, who was loudly applauded on rising, said it might be useful to remark that Gorton was one of those suburbs of large towns where a considerable population had been hastily collected from every portion of the kingdom, so that the members of the new community were strangers to each other, and whilst they were yet without many of the means of civilisation and social advancement in their colony, they were also wanting in those friendly feelings and acquaintanceships which had effected so much improvement in older settlements (Hear, hear). It was, however, most creditable to the workmen at Gorton that they had set their shoulders to the wheel in the spirited manner detailed in the report. They had taxed themselves willingly, apparently conceiving that there could be no tyranny or annoyance connected with an impost which was clearly entitled to their own free service. Those who felt concerned for the success of this institution were convinced that education was a working man's question. The children of the richer classes were instructed as a matter of course, but the orderly man was hindered from having his children well trained by the necessity of devoting his own earnings to the physical maintenance of his family, as well as of supporting himself. Hence it was that so many children of every 100 persons in this community were either totally unable to read or write, or possessed only so little of those elementary accomplishments as was of no practical use. In those European countries on the other hand which were usually considered the seats of despotism, and also amongst the Anglo-Saxons across the Atlantic, a man so ignorant would be positively an object of wonder (Hear, hear). He would be under service general, and impartial system of popular education was proposed here, it always met the opposition of persons who seemed to be perpetually getting astride of some crotchet and dismounting from it to mount another, and who, though suffering no injury from the prosecution of the plan, would deny the working man education because they could not administer it exactly in the form and with the time and seasons convenient to themselves. It was high time that we set aside all those obstacles which had hitherto stood in the way of that which must raise the working man in his social and moral position. There were many still found, even in crowded industrial communities, who looked upon the working men as mere machines and instruments to execute their bidding, and as a class that never could be raised to the same position as their employers in their own high opinion, might occupy. From such men the Gorton Institute had received very little assistance; and he might say confidently that their assistance was not at all required, for this institution had set an example that might be followed with advantage in cases where employers and their labourers possessed within themselves a great industrial organisation, which might be turned to the purposes of education.

Mr. Willey, one of the company's employés at Gorton, urged his fellow-workmen to devote greater attention to those portions of the library which were of more practical than general value, and so far forth assented to a request among the members.

Mr. Thomas Bazley, the President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, in proposing a vote of thanks to Popular Education," remarked that [illegible] location was undoubtedly the great want of the age, and the absence of it led to failures in every pursuit in life. Success in life was only obtained by a development of the mind, which was thus enabled to render service to the individual, and to all who came within the sphere of his influence.

Mr. Absalom Watkin, referring to the remarks made by Mr. Willey about the reading of novels, thought that there were many novels that gone a little too far. No doubt novels might be read to an injurious extent, but at the same time it must be recollected that our greatest men, for instance John Milton, was a reader, not of novels, for they did not then exist, but of romances; and that James Watt was a great reader of novels, and that many other men of great eminence had a fondness for the mode of conveying their time. He agreed with Mr. Willey that if there was, generally speaking, better to read history than novels, and that the reading of the [illegible] country was a most useful exercise, for it was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

There is no foundation for the report that Sir J. Bowring is in ill health. Up to the 12th of November he was perfectly well.

THE SHIPWRECK OF THE "NORTHERN BELLE."

I.

What tribute shall we give the brave
Who fight the glorious fight,
Who stand or fall in freedom's cause
Defenders of the right,
Who ward the blow that tyrants deal
And vengeance they would wreak?
The meed they claim—the wreath of fame,
The glory which they seek;
Living, th' applause of grateful crowds
And pathways fresh with blooms;
And, when they die, the world's regret
Emblazoned on their tombs.

II.

And what the tribute greater still
We owe the humbler brave,
Who, though the light of glory shine
Like sunlight on the wave,
Look up from sunlight to the sun,
And see, through clouds afar,
The fairer ray, more bright than day,
Of Duty's guiding star;
Who ask no recompense of men,
To save a brother's life?
And shame by greater bravery
The bravest deeds of strife?

III.

What shall we give them—souls sublime,
Who in the stormy dark,
When frantic seas assault the shore,
And whirl the helpless bark
On treacherous sands, hear far away,
Amid the fitful gale,
The boom of guns, the seaman's cry,
Or dying woman's wail,
Then launch their skiff, through blinding foam
Of wild waves tempest-trod,
Their errand, Love; their only guides,
Their own true hearts and God?

IV.

Heroes of Peace! No pomp of war,
Or sound of fife and drum;
No splendour of the soldiers' craft,
Or hope of joys to come,
Make quick their pulse with high resolve,
Or nerve their honest hands;
They only feel that Mercy calls,
And at its high commands
They look at peril face to face,
With calm, untroubled eye;
And, when it bursts, undaunted still,
They meet it—and defy!

V.

What shall we give them? Honor? Fame?
Ay, these, and something more—
The gratitude of free men's hearts,
And tribute from their store;
Yet, not to satisfy a debt
'Twould beggar gold to pay,
But, for example to the world,
High gleaming to the day;
The gallant hearts the hardy wights—
Who, mid the foam and swell,
Made famous in all time to come
The hapless "Northern Belle."

VI.

And those who died—the noble nine?—
When pitying sighs are borne,
We'll not forget their orphan babes
If nought can dry those widows' tears,
And heal the wounded heart,
To help them in their hour of need,
Let England do its part.
Small bounty—great in its intent—
May light their household fires;
And teach their babes in future days
To imitate their sires.

Jan. 14th, 1857. CHARLES MACKAY.

In last week's publication we gave a brief notice of the loss of this vessel, but the brave conduct of the Broadstairs boatmen, through whose exertions the crew of that vessel were rescued from their perilous situation, deserves a more extended report.

It was about three a.m. during the dreadful storm on Monday, the 5th inst., that the Northern Belle, from New York to London, came to an anchor off Kingsgate, about three-quarters of a mile from the shore. A few hours later she rode very heavily, and the sea at times broke completely over her. The crew having cut away the mizen and main masts, the ship rode easier; but as the gale increased, and as it was feared that she would part from her anchors and come on shore, a message was sent to Broadstairs to that effect. The Broadstairs boatmen, who are renowned for their alacrity, immediately harnessed themselves to the truck on which the life-boat—the Mary White—is always ready, and proceeded to drag it from Broadstairs to Kingsgate, a distance of two miles, over a heavy and hilly country. It was nine o'clock when the boat arrived at Kingsgate. By that time the news of the ship's dangerous position was spread throughout the neighbourhood, and by eleven o'clock the cliffs were crowded by persons of all ranks from Margate, Ramsgate, and Broadstairs. At 11.30 a.m. the multitude assembled were destined to witness a very painful sight. A Margate lugger, called the Victory, was hovering about the ship in the hope of rendering her some assistance, when a huge sea struck her and she suddenly disappeared from sight. She and her crew went down, and were no more seen. Another lugger, the Ocean, of Margate, had at six a.m. put five hands on board the Northern Belle. At noon, it was expected every moment that the ship would run on shore upon the rocks beneath the cliff; but she held on, the crowd remaining until dark anxiously watching the vessel, despite the hail, sleet, and snow, which began to descend. Between ten and eleven on Monday night, the ship parted with her anchor and drove upon the rocks. At that hour it would have been utterly impossible to launch the life-boat, for the hail, sleet, and snow prevented the men from seeing any object whatever; and the spot whence it would be necessary to put off was distant more than half a mile. When day broke, at between six and seven o'clock next morning, an awful sight was revealed to those on the cliffs and on the beach. With the naked eye could be seen twenty-three men lashed to the rigging of the only mast left standing. What these poor creatures must have suffered during the night the reader will readily imagine.

At half-past seven o'clock on Tuesday morning the life-boat, the Mary White, was manned. Since July, 1850, when this boat was presented to the boatmen of Broadstairs by Mr. Thomas White, of Cowes, she has saved many lives, and her crew have encountered many dangers; but never had she been engaged in a matter of such peculiar peril. Ten brave men pulled through a boiling surf and raging sea, which several times hid them from sight, and filled all with alarm for their safety. When seven out of the twenty-three men upon the wreck had been got into the life-boat it was found necessary to cut her adrift and disentangle her from the ship With these seven men the boat returned to the shore amid the cheers of the many persons assembled on the beach.

A second life-boat, which had also been wheeled from Broadstairs, to be ready in the event of the first life-boat being lost, was now launched, and went off to the wreck. She succeeded in bringing away fourteen. The two remaining were the captain and the pilot, who had been taken in at Dover. The former declared that he would rather die than leave his vessel, and the latter expressed a desire to remain and perish in the old man's company. After an hour and a half had elapsed the life-boat for the third time left the shore in order to persuade these two men to save their lives. After much difficulty the crew of the boat succeeded in inducing them to come off the rigging and go to the land. It is impossible to describe the scene on the beach when it was known that all hands had been saved. A more affecting scene was seldom witnessed. There were tears of gratitude shed by the Americans, tears of joy and of pride by the Broadstairs boatmen. Benumbed as the shipwrecked men were, they could scarcely partake of the refreshment which was provided for them in the little warm parlour of "The Captain Digby," the solitary inn which stands upon the cliff at Kingsgate.

At three o'clock on Tuesday the Mary White was dragged upon her truck by three horses into Broadstairs. In the boat sat her gallant crew. Tied to an American oar was the American standard which was so recently hoisted as a signal of distress. The tattered flag fluttered over the Union Jaws of the Mary White. It was thus that the boat passed through the streets of Broadstairs, amidst the joyous shouts of the inhabitants of the town. We have engraved this stirring scene.

Nearly all the brave fellows who, at the imminent peril of their own lives, were thus engaged in restoring to America the lives of nineteen of those seamen of whom she is so justly proud, are married men with large families of small children; and there is not a man among them who has not assisted in saving life, and who has not, at some period, lost a father, brother, or cousin in the same glorious cause.

A subscription has been opened to reward the deserving and self-sacrificing conduct of the crews of the two boats; and General Robert Campbell, the United States' Consul in London, has appealed in their behalf to the American residents in the metropolis; and Mr. Joseph Rodney Croskey has generously subscribed £50 to the above fund. Mr. Laing, in a letter to the Times, states the names of the crews of the boats, and adds some well-timed details:

Crew of the Mary White.—John Castle, George Castle, William Hiller (junior), Robert Miller, James Rowe, George Emptage, Edward Emptage. This boat saved seven hands.

Crew of the Culmer White on her first trip to the wreck.—John Cowell, William Wales, Jethrow Miller, John Sandwell, George Emptage, Thomas Holborn, William Ralph, Robert Gilbert, Robert Parker. Saved fourteen hands

Crew of the Culmer White on her second trip to save the Captain and Pilot.—John Cowell, William Wales, Jethrow Miller, Jerry Walker, Fred. Lawrence, Thomas Sandwell, Robert Simpson, James Bere, Robert Parker, George Emptage, Alfred Emptage.

These men, sir, were not labouring under any species of excitement when they engaged in the perilous duty which they performed so nobly and so well.

Under the impression that those men would never return—the impression of all who witnessed their departure from the shore—I watched their countenances closely. There was nothing approaching bravado in their demeanour—nothing to give a spectator an idea that they were about to engage in a matter of ah or death to themselves and the crew of the ship clinging to the tore rigging of the Northern Belle. They had no hope of a "decoration," or of pecuniary reward when, with a coolness of manner and a calmness of mind which evinced strength with the energy of their movements, they "stripped to their shirts" and bounded into the Mary White and the Culmer White to storm batteries of billows far more appalling to the human mind than batteries surrounded by cannon, and bristling with bayonets. There could be no question about the hero ism of these men.

THE EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA AT VENICE.—A letter from Venice states that the Emperor of Austria, who was still at Venice when the Count and Countess de Chambord arrived there, paid them a visit, and had them to dine with him on the following day. The intended amusements at Milan during the stay of the Emperor will include. Illumination a giorno of La Scala Theatre, which their Majesties will honour with their presence in the evening. In the night of the 18th a corso notturno, a favourite amusement of the Italians, and which consists of an incessant promenade of carriages, brilliantly lighted up, and accompanied by bands of music, through all the finest parts of the city, and in the midst of a general illumination. In the night of the 21st a grand ball will take place at La Scala, in which will be introduced an allegorical ballet composed expressly for the occasion. Lastly, a distribution of a sum of 50,700 Austrian livres in different works of charity.

"SOFT SAWDER."—The French papers are much amused with Sir Robert Peel's speech, and give copious extracts from it, together with translations from the comments of the London journals. The Assemblee of Saturday devotes an article of four columns to the matter, but it is only remarkable for the floundering attempts made to translate the Knight-errant expression "soft sawder." The redacteurs of the assemblee, who probably put their heads together and consulted all their dictionaries, give the result of their learned researches in the following note:—"It is all soft sawder, an expression more American than English, and one which it is impossible to translate literally. 'Soft sawder' means a sawyer who handles his saw lazily, and does but little work. A 'soft sawder' is what in the language of working people, is called un lambin, un grand lâche, une poule mouillée." Having by this lexicographical process obtained a choice of epithets, the Assemblee selects lambin as the most appropriate, and accordingly in the text of the article it is represented that Sir Robert Peel, instead of saying that the Grand Duke's frankness and cordiality was all "soft sawder," called him a "great drone" (lambin).

BIRTHS, DEATHS, AND MARRIAGES IN AUSTRALIA.—The number of births registered in the colony during the last ten years—viz., from 1846 to 1855 inclusive—was 40,592 males, 39,332 females. The proportions of the respective sexes in each 10,000 births were, in ten years, 5072 males, 4928 females. The deaths registered during the same period numbered 18,429 males, 12,383 females. The average mortality of males between 1846 and 1855 was 1 to 43; that of females, 1 to 66. The net gain to the population by the excess of births over deaths was—

The number of marriages returned from 1846 to 1850 were 7614, during the next five years they numbered 13,148; being an increase of 4371, or 56 per cent. The number of births, deaths, and marriages in the colony last year averaged daily—births, 23; deaths, 11; marriages, 8. Sydney Herald.

A DEXTEROUS TRICK.—On the 28th of October a person named Louis Albrecht presented himself for the third time at the office of M. Fauche, an importer of watches, to complete the purchase of a number of those articles, which he had looked at on some previous visits Having selected what would suit him, he requested the invoice, which would amount to 2,000 dollars, to be made out. Albrecht was accompanied by a young man about 17 or 18, who, like himself, spoke French, and whom he introduced to M. Fauche as his nephew. When the bargain was concluded, M. Fauche was about to put the watches into their cases, when Albrecht stopped him by saying that he had brought a small box with compartments ready to place them in. When the watches had been so placed, and the case afterwards tied round with a string, Albrecht requested to be allowed to put a seal on it, saying that he would leave it, and send his nephew to pay the money and fetch

PRIVATE THEATRICALS AT TAVISTOCK HOUSE.—SCENE FROM "THE FROZEN DEEP."

TAVISTOCK HOUSE THEATRICALS.

TWELFTH-NIGHT was signalised at Mr. Dickens' residence by one of those dramatic performances which have so frequently done honour to the talent and taste of our great novelist. An entirely new romantic drama was provided for the occasion. It is in three acts, and the production of Mr. Wilkie Collins, whose genius for this class of piece it charmingly illustrates. Under the title of "The Frozen Deep," the rigours of the Arctic regions are scenically portrayed, both by description and the pencil of Mr. Stanfield and Mr. Dawson. Previously, however, to their exhibition, we have a most effective domestic scene in Kent, painted by Mr. Telbin, in which the members of the family of Captain Ebsworth and Lieutenants Crayford and Steventon, who are on board certain vessels engaged in an expedition at the North Pole, are assembled, and disclose the sufferings and the suspense by which they are agonised during the absence of their beloved relatives. These consist of five young ladies —Mrs. Steventon (Miss Helen), Rose Ebsworth (Miss Kate), Lucy Crayford (Miss Hogarth), Clare Burnham (Miss Mary), and the Nurse Esther (Mrs. Wills), with their Maid (Miss Martha). The exceedingly natural manner in which these fair young creatures enacted and discoursed of their sorrows gave to this private performance an advantage over any possible public representation; it was, in a word, exquisite. The part of Clara Burnham was, indeed, an ambitious one, and required excellent acting. It was rendered with feeling, grace, and pathetic emphasis. This lady has two lovers—one Richard Wardour, performed by Mr. Charles Dickens himself, and the other Frank Aldersley (Mr. Wilkie Collins), to whom she is engaged. The former has vowed a terrible vengeance against his rival. And, now that they are both on the Polar Seas together, Clara's fears are awakened, and haunt her imagination continually. To deepen the impression still more, Nurse Esther pretends to second sight, and predicts the most fatal catastrophe; this character was admirably impersonated by her representative. The Arctic scenes are, however, the great scenes of this excellent drama. Here we meet with Crayford, Aldersley, and Wardour, about whom the tragic interest gathers. Doubts are entertained of the character of the last from his strange conduct. This arises from "the pangs of despised love" with which his heart still wrestles. As yet he knows not who his rival may be, and does not suspect that he dwells in the same hut with him. Lieutenant Crayford, a bluff, hearty sailor (finely acted by Mr. Mark Lemon), takes a strong interest in him, and believes in his inherent goodness. But at length his faith gives way; for, in a well-managed conversation, he penetrates the state of Wardour's soul, and forms of his tendencies the most awful judgment. Soon after Wardour makes the discovery that Aldersley is his rival; and his reso-lation is formed to accomplish the vengeance on which he had so long brooded. We next find all the party, with the young ladies, on the shore of Newfoundland. But Wardour and Aldreda are for awhile missing, and Crayford is haunted with the horrible suspicion that the latter has been made the victim of the former. Wardour in rags, wild as a maniac, rushes into the cave. He claims food and drink, part of which he takes, and carefully preserves the rest in a wallet. Crayford at last recognises him endeavours to seize him—but the madman dashes away, soon to return, with poor exhausted Aldewisy in his arms. He [illegible] become the preserver of the man whom he had seduced to the most [illegible] latest scene in which we find the unhappy deceiver making the [illegible] preparation for his intended crime, and, ere his [illegible] the union of [illegible] and [illegible]. Here [illegible] will perceive that Mr. Charles Dickens had in such a [illegible] as this a part that required the consummate acting of a well-practised performer. Too much praise cannot be bestowed on the [illegible] interpretation that it received from him. It was a fearful, powerful, and distinct individuality, thoroughly made out in all its details. A very fine overture and some charming incidental music composed by Mr. Francesco Berger, were admirably performed by a small chamber orchestra.

Mr. Inchbald's excellent farce of "Animal Magnetism" concluded the evening's amusements. The Doctor was capitally impersonated by Mr. Dickens; and Mr. Mark Lemon, as Pedrillo, was again most effective, and withal natural acting with equal modesty and skill.

On Wednesday last the concluding representation took place—the performances ending with Buckstone's excellent farce of "Uncle John." Mr. Dickens, as the vigorous old gentleman of seventy, displayed a new phase of his versatile genius, and proved himself a consummate actor; while Mr. Augustus Egg and Miss Hogarth, in the parts of Mr and Mrs. Hawk, gave proofs of histrionic powers, which might well qualify them for any stage. There was a large but select audience present, including the principal celebrities of law literature, science, and the arts—who have the privilege and the happiness of Mr. Dickens's acquaintance.

"BRINGING HOME THE DEER."

THIS characteristic scene is engraved from a drawing made by Mr. Bottomley on a recent visit to the Highlands of Scotland. The locality is the wild and desolate district well known to sportsmen as the Marquis of Breadalbane's Deer Forest of Blackmount. The Artist thus describes the incident:—"The gralloching being over, a stick was quickly tied to the horns of the hart, and the strong fore-arm carried off the heavy animal through the stream, over the hills to the point where the pony was waiting to bring the prize home. Following are two fierce-looking hounds, eager to devour their prey, but prevented by the Gillie. The general sport is thus vividly described:—

Many of the Scottish forests, wherein the stalking of deer in their wild state is practised, are of immense extent. It is on such tracts of land as the forests of Mar, Atholl, and Invercauld—not inferior to the smaller English counties in extent—that the red-deer is sought. The forest of Athole alone is said to be more than forty miles long, and in one part eighteen broad, of which about 30,000 imperial acres are devoted to grouse, [illegible] and partly to deer, and there are reserved solely for deer [illegible] 15,000 imperial acres. In these vast solitudes—if the [illegible] recently assigned to deer by tradition be true—the Highlander stalks the identical harts which, a century ago, bore the scars of the weapons of his ancestors.

The dogs are slipped and put upon the scent, and are out of sight in a moment. The stalker follows; he again climbs a considerable way up the heights; he applies the telescope, but nothing of life can he behold, except his few followers on the lower hill-side. With his ear to the ground he listens, and amidst the roar of innumerable torrents, faintly hears the dogs baying the quarry, but sees them not; he moves on from hill to hill towards the scene, but eventually seeks the deer by tracking the hart his own. The deer are then bled and gralloched, and partially covered with peat; the horns are left upright, and a handkerchief is tied to them to mark the spot, that the hill-men may find them at the close of the day. The interest of all this is enhanced by the majestic scenery of an immense, trackless, treeless forest—to which domesticated life is a stranger where mountain, corrie, cairn, and glen, succeed each other in several together, present the grandest of savage landscapes, and as the fled of wild adventure, cast into shade what Mr. Scrope not unaptly designates "the tame and hedge-bound country of the south!"—Black's Picturesque Tourist of Scotland.

PRESENTATION OF PLATE AND TESTIMONIAL TO A. G. EASTWOOD, ESQ. The inhabitants of Todmorden and Hebden-bridge have just presented Mr. A. G. Eastwood, their late member, and clerk to the magistrates, a handsome service of plate, comprising an elegant coffee and tea service, in acknowledgment of his services relative to the postal arrangements for the district. Under these regulations, the letters were delivered earlier than ten o'clock, and many of them were an extra day on the road. No letters could be dispatched later than three o'clock. The free delivery was limited to a radius of about 800 yards from the post offices, and no receiving-houses existed. The letters now arrive before eight o'clock, thus securing delivery before the merchants and tradespeople start for the markets, and are dispatched several hours later.

PRESENTATION OF A PIANOFORTE.—A pianoforte has been presented to Mr. J. G. Walton, as a testimonial for his indefatigable zeal as conductor of the parish church, Bradford. Mr. Walton has long laboured gratuitously, and has brought the choir to a degree of efficiency that was formerly the case. The idea of presenting him with a pianoforte originated with the choir, who have contributed freely, and through the exertions of Mr. Woodcock and Mr. Blamires, a handsome sum was raised. This has been expended on a beautiful seven-octave rosewood cottage pianoforte, by Kirkman and Sons, which has been fitted up by that eminent firm in a very chaste manner. The tone and touch are delightful, and the instrument reflects the highest credit on the maker.—Bradford Observer.

READING, LITERARY, AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.—The institution, of which Prince Albert and many of the nobility are patrons, and Mr. Charles Dickens the President, was reopened by the Lord Bishop of Oxford, on the 11th November, with an admirable introductory address. The present list of lecturers includes many men eminent for talent and talent—the Dean of Westminster, the Rev. Charles Kingsley, and many others. We were present last Tuesday at a very amusing and instructive lecture, well delivered by Mr. G. Farquhar Graham, on Buchanan now well known as an elocutionist and corrector of vocal and articulative defects, on "Poetry and Ballad Music." Mr. Thompson's clear enunciation and very happy illustrations of the connection of music and study of his art, enable him to give great effect to an anecdote, a dramatic dialogue, or an English ballad—and he gave very successful specimens of his powers in all these ways, much to the gratification of his audience. There being, however, a general complaint that the lecture was too short, and Mr. Thompson stepping on the platform accidentally, or to remove his paper [illegible] appeared to address them, and greeted him with such applause that he was thus, in a manner, compelled to resent himself at the pianoforte, and, after singing two more ballads, bowed his thanks and retired.

SOMERLEYTON HALL.—In our Number for last week, in describing this fine seat of Sir Samuel Morton Peto, Bart., we omitted to state that the whole of the oak carving and furniture, which is all of the same character (temp. Charles II.), were designed and executed by Mr. Willcox, of Warwick; as well as the furniture of the drawing-room, [illegible], &c.

MARRIAGE OF THE COUNT DE MORNY.—M. de Morny was married in St. Petersburg on Thursday, to the Princess Sophie Troubetzkoi, daughter of the Prince [illegible] Governor-General of the Empire of Russia. The Princess is only twenty-three; the [illegible] Institution of the Imperial Maidens of Honour. The Dowager wished to gift her to the reigning Empress as one of her ladies, but the Emperor Nicholas said she would [illegible] to wish her, for she was far too beautiful." Of a truth, her beauty does pass [illegible] incomparable. Persons of her own family [illegible] fearfully beautiful." There is no [illegible] may be ever move on the part of Russian politicians, and be much less indifferent to the march of public affairs than might be at first supposed. [illegible] has now a permanent agent at the Court of the Tuileries, and [illegible] influential than ever, and Russia find a [illegible] in the lovely Princess Troubetzkoi than either the aged Princess Lieven, or any of her other principle diplomatists. The Princess, her mother, has resided a long time in France. Count de Morny, it is said, presented his bride on her marriage with diamonds to the value of two millions. Two days before he had requested and obtained [illegible] the consent of the Emperor Napoleon to [illegible] Bury.

DISCOVERY OF MOLIÈRE'S LETTERS.—It is announced in the French papers that a discovery has been made in the provinces, [illegible] person not specified—of a collection of letters written during the time of Louis Quatorze, by several Jesuits belonging to the College of Clermont, and addressed to one Birnier, who is stated to have been a friend and fellow collegian with Molière. Among these several letters by the great comic writer have been found, dated towards the year 1654, from Montpellier, and referring to "Le Dépit Amoreux," which comedy was produced about that period. These, as all students of Molière's life are aware, will prove of rare, almost of unique, value—if they can be established as genuine.

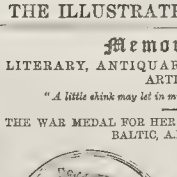
THE WAR MEDAL FOR HER MAJESTY'S FLEETS IN THE BALTIC, A.D. 1854-1855



WHEN the Queen had reviewed the magnificent fleet prepared for the service of 1855, with her invariable appreciation of merit in every branch of her services, she was graciously pleased to announce to the Baltic Admiral that it was her intention to command a medal for distribution to all who had taken share in the blockade of Russia in the Baltic during the war—and we have before us this additional testimony of her Majesty's beneficent consideration.

The obverse presents the same fine portrait of the Queen as the other war medals engraved by the late Wm. Wyon, R.A. The reverse is executed by his son, Leonard Wyon, and the composition of both is equally appropriate and classical. Britannia is sitting (we may suppose, on the quarter-deck of the flag-ship), and at the extremity of the sea perspective are Svaeborg and Bomarsund. Her right hand grasps the uplifted trident; the left rests on the oube that forms her seat. The attitude of Britannia is extremely graceful, the expression alive and intensely vigilant—"a look-out," from which not a rag of the enemy's sail could escape detection; the figure, indeed, appears ready to spring up at a moment's warning, and aptly symbolises the burning anxiety of the whole fleet during the two seasons that they kept "watch and ward" on Russia, that they might fall to or fall on the ships and forcesses of the Czar.

The engraving of this personification of "hope deferred" in artistic merit is upon a par with its poetical conception; the draperies are simple and effective; the anatomy delicately true to nature, and that nature dignified female beauty. Over the figure is inscribed "Baltic;" in the exergue, "1854-55;" and below, "I. O. Wyon."

NOTES.

THE BOSWELL CORRESPONDENCE.—Considerable interest has been excited by the recent publication of the correspondence between the biographer of Johnson and the Rev. Mr. Temple. The latter was Rector of Mamhead, in Devon, where he was frequently visited by Boswell; and particular allusion is made to the yew-tree in the churchyard there. Mamhead is beautifully situated on the acclivity of a bold emmence, commanding fine views of the southern coast, a few miles east of Exeter. The estate, in the seventeenth century, belonged to the Balle family, of whom there is an account in "Prince's Worthies of Devon." It afterwards passed, by purchase, to the Nightingales. An heiress of that family conveyed it by marriage to the Hon. Wilmot Vaughan, Earl of Lisburne. The third Earl sold it to Sir Robert William Newman, Bart., who resided in the city of Exeter in several Parliaments. He took down the old seat of the Balles and built the present magnificent mansion. He was succeeded by his son, the late Sir Robert Lydstone Newman, who fell in the Crimean war. A monumental has been erected in the church by the gentry of Devonshire in the family pew in great respect. He was succeeded by his brother, the present Baronet, [illegible] in the park near the mansion [illegible] Oliver's [illegible] Mamhead. [illegible] Wilmot Vaughan, Earl of Lisburne, and Stephen Weston, D.D., was admitted [illegible] 1777. As the present [illegible] had shortly before [illegible] Earl of Lisburne Boswell continued his correspondence until his death in 1795. Can any of your numerous correspondents say what became of Temple? I can find no trace of him after he left Devonshire. The unfounded legend has been connected with Mamhead, which may deserve to be mentioned in refutation. A blundering writer in an Exeter newspaper, some years ago, stated that Thompson's celebrated tale, in the "Seasons," of "Celadon and Amelia," originated in an incident connected with the woods of Mamhead, where Mrs. Nightingale was killed by a flash of lightning when walking with her husband, and died in his arms. No such accident ever occurred. The tale in question was taken from a narrative in Pope's Letters, which describes the sudden death of two rural lovers by lightning under a haystack. This happened near Nuneham Courtenay, in Oxfordshire, the seat of Earl Harcourt. The unfortunate peasants were buried in the church of Nuneham, where a tomb and inscription were raised to their memory. In fact the Nightingale family were not possessed of Mamhead when Thompson published his "Summer," in which is the tale of Celadon and Amelia. Could it have originated from the celebrated monument in Westminster Abbey by Roubilliac to the memory of Mrs. Nightingale, where her husband is warding off the stroke of death from his dying wife?—A DEVONSHIRE RECTOR.

ANOTHER ODE ON THE DEATH OF SIR JOHN MOORE.—Mr. Fitzpatrick's recent interesting paper on Wolfe's Ode to the Memory of Sir John Moore, has reminded me of some old lines on the same sad subject, not of any remarkable intrinsic beauty, but interesting from their having been written on the night of Sir John Moore's death by an officer of distinguished merit and station. After a search through some musty papers, I found the following lines, known only of a few lines, written seven years after the retreat at Corunna; but the following, written on the spot by an eye-witness, will be perfectly new to your readers. It derives its interest from the subject, and circumstances of its composition.—I am, Sir, your constant reader, H. EDGEWORTH.

ODE ON THE DEATH OF SIR JOHN MOORE.

| Ye slaves, who hug th' invaders chain; | And there, with Glory on the line, |
| Hence from this hallowed grave. | Let Glory on her page enroll |
| But you, Spain's chosen sons, draw near, | Each chief who boasts the uncon-quer'd soul. |
| 'Tis yours to grace with virtue's tear, | With Moore's illustrious name. |
| The spot where sleeps the brave. | |
| For you his gallant hands he led, | And thou, loved hero, peaceful sleep! |
| For you in honour's field he bled | No more with fond regret I'll weep, |
| And fell, by all deplored! | Though immature thy noon, |
| Abashed, appalled, the trembling Gaul | Honours attend thee still on earth; |
| Beheld the hero's glorious fall, | Britain shall ever boast thy birth, |
| And fled from Britain's sword. | And Spain shall show thy tomb! |

ABSALOM'S HAIR.—The late Dr. Kitto, in his very valuable Notes to the "Pictorial Bible," says that "the sacred historian condescends to notice the circumstance of 'Absalom's hair being weighed at 200 shekels after the King's weight,' in order to explain and give point to the fact that the locks which Absalom so fondly cherished became subsequently the occasion of his death." (II. Sam., xiv., 26.) But is not this "fact" nothing more or less than a Jewish tradition? It has not the authority of Scripture, which says that "Absalom rode upon a mule; and the mule went under the thick boughs of a great oak, and his head caught hold of the oak, and he was taken up between the heaven and the earth, and the mule that was under him went away." (II. Sam., xviii., 9.) Here there is no a word about Absalom's hair, or his dying in the manner with which Scripture paints have made us familiar. In fact, unless we are to imagine that Absalom had lost his helmet during the fight, his head must have been so covered that it was not possible for him to have been suspended by his hair. For, as helmets and other defensive armour were then generally worn (the first complete suit that we read of was that worn by Goliath of Gath), we may reason [illegible] that Absalom was protected. It seems more probable, therefore, that, instead of his hair being entangled in the oak boughs—as tradition says and art paints—"his head caught hold of the oak," as says the Scripture, being wedged in between the boughs, in such a manner that he would not only be unable to release himself, but would also be faint and powerless from strangulation. If he wore a helmet it may, by its shape, have increased the helplessness of his position; but, at any rate, his hair seems to have had nothing to do with the matter. Its weight has, also been a matter of speculation for the curious. Abundant hair was then a glory to a man, and not, as in St. Paul's time, a shame (I. Cor. xi., 14). With Absalom it would appear to have been not a glory, but a vanity. Its weight we are told, was "200 shekels after the King's weight." By Cumberland, computing this by the Jewish shekel, makes the weight of Absalom's hair to have been 8 lb 4 oz. troy. (The average weight of an Englishman's head of hair is from four to five ounces). But, the Books of Samuel were revised after the Babylonish captivity, and "the King's weight" might mean the Babylonish shekel, which, being about a third of the Hebrew shekel, would reduce the weight of the hair to something over two pounds. Its natural weight may have been artificially increased, if, (as seems not improbable), it was plastered with unguents, and thickly sprinkled with grains of gold. Dr. Kitto says, "Others, again, suppose that 200 shekels mean the loss of the hair when sold; but it does not seem likely that the King's son would sell his hair, nor can we see to what use it could be applied by those who bought it." On this point, I extract from a family Bible (black letter, 1636), the following manuscript note by a remote ancestor:—"We cannot suppose ye loppings of Absalom's hair weighed either 50 or 100 oz. But yet we it was cut off, his servants might have sold it for 13lb. 10s., or 25lbs. to ye Ladys of Jerusalem, who were ambitious of adorning ye heads of ye Hair of ye Kings children; yet ye looks of ye Lyon." This is an ingenious suggestion, and not inconsistent with the character of Absalom; for, though it seems doubtful whether false hair was worn by Jewish women in the form of a wig, yet they may occasionally have worn locks of hair as an ornament or pas d'amour. It is recorded that when Absalom was buried "they laid a very great heap of stones on him." (Joshua vii, 26; viii, 29). Was this in detestation and abhorrence, or in honourable memory of a Prince and Chief? Is the former, did it give rise to the custom of flinging stones on the grave of malefactors?—CUTHBERT BEDE, B.A.

QUERIES.

LONGLEAT AND THE WARS OF THE ROSES.—In reading an article on the rose, the other day, I met with an anecdote to the effect that, during the civil wars in England, between the houses of York and Lancaster, a French rose-tree (Rosa Gallica?) was discovered in a garden at Longleat, covered on one side with white roses, and on the opposite with red; that immediately on this being rumoured abroad, crowds of anxious citizens went to see the great prodigy, and that all beheld it, and returned to their homes happy in the belief that it portended the speedy return of peace to their country by a union of the rival powers. According to the same tradition, we are informed that a short time afterwards the tree bore roses of mixed petals, and immediately followed the marriage of Henry VII. and Elizabeth, thus fulfilling the floral prediction by the friendship and union of the contending parties. The rose was, I should think, an early specimen of our "York and Lancaster," a red and white—the colours of the two houses—hence its name, and although probably the account is only a mere fable, it has, like many others, found its way into history. Perhaps some correspondent can inform me of the worthy historian who first recorded the circumstance, as I am curious to know to whom the story owes its preservation? Longleat—though now one of the most primely mansions in England—was, at the period of which the narrative speaks, the Carthusian priory, of the history of which little is known before the Reformation, when the monks robbing Henry seized the site and lands attached to it, and granted them to Sir John Horsey, of Clifton, county Dorset; after which the whole was purchased, by Sir John Thynne, in 1567 commenced building the present superb structure, and from whom it has lineally descended to its present noble proprietor, the Marquis of Bath.
W. C., Oatlands Park.

WHERE DOES THE DAY BEGIN?—Permit me to vary W. Symons's question in your "Memorabilia" for January 10th by asking, Where does any particular day begin (say Monday) begin and end? In India, and I suppose also at Hong-Kong, it begins several hours before commencing in Europe; in America, several hours later, making the circuit of the earth in twenty-four hours. Somewhere, in the Pacific, perhaps, the minute after midnight first comes being called Monday, and take the name of Tuesday. Will some of your correspondents, learned in these matters, tell us where?—ROBERT BAINES.

THE SONG OF "THE BAY OF BISCAY, O!"—Can any of your readers throw light on the origin of the well-known song, written by Andrew Cherry, called "The Bay of Biscay, O!"? There is another ballad of the same name, written by a homely mariner in true Grub-street doggerel, containing eight verses, with four lines in each verse, which includes both "Rumsey" and "Lady o' Canterbury," and records that the vessel (not named) about which the song was written sailed from Spithead for Gibraltar on the 14th of April: the year is not given. The incidents it speaks of are a "white squall," loss of man and fore masts, three guns; five men drowned, and the captain killed on the quarterdeck by a stroke of lightning. One or other, or both these songs are supposed to have reference to a ship, name untraced, which landed with military recruits raised in Scotland on the 16th April, 1761, at Gibraltar. The vessel had lost her masts in the Bay of Biscay, and sailed jury-rigged to the fortress. There is no question that [illegible] the title of "Bay of Biscay, O!" was written concerning this ship; but which, is the point to ascertain. Cherry's song is a general one; but the seaman's allusion to the straits of a particular ship: what was the name of that ship? If the sailor's ballad have reference to the vessel which landed the military recruits, there is a discrepancy not easily to be accounted for with respect to the dates. The song says the vessel sailed from Spithead on the 14th April; the official record states that the recruits landed on the 16th April, from Scotland. This is a long story. It may, nevertheless, be worth the inquiry, not only to establish a point in the annals of a particular corps, but to establish the history of either or both songs.—R. R.

I will add for your information the second and third verses of the seaman's ballad:

On the 14th day of April from Spithead we set sail
With the Rumsey in our company, with a sweet and pleasant gale,
We both of us sailed together, for the Bay of Biscay O
When the white squall came on us and the stormy wind did blow

The white squall came on us, and the Rumsey bore away;
We left the Lady o'Canterbury, for we could no longer stay;
She sailed into Gibraltar, and told the people so,
But I never thought we were lost, in the Bay of Biscay O

The verses narrating the disasters follow.

MONEY BEQUEATHED FOR RELIGIOUS PURPOSES.—Can you or any of your readers give me a few of the most memorable instances in history of men having bequeathed money for religious purposes?
W. C.

I HAVE often met with this line, can you tell me whose it is? F.R.S.

"He comes too near, that comes to be denied."

[It occurs in Sir Thomas Overbury's admirable little poem, "A Wife."

Women behaviour is a surer barre
Then is their no; that rarely doth deny
Without longing; deny they kept they are Safe ev'n from hope: in part to blame is she,
Which hath without consent bin only tride.
He comes too near, that comes to be denide.

We are glad of the opportunity afforded by our querist to direct attention to an excellent edition of Overbury's miscellaneous works, by Dr. Rimbault, which Russell Smith has just published. The collection contains the celebrated poem mentioned above; his famous "Characters;" a paraphrase of the first and second parts of Ovid's "Remedy of Love;" "Observations in his Travailes," &c.; and "Crumms fall'n from King James' Table." These are accompanied by valuable explanatory notes, and a biographical account of the author, the whole forming an elegant and extremely interesting little volume.]

SPORTSMEN and GENTLEMEN of the ARMY and NAVY.—S. and H. SOLOMONS, Opticians, 39, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly. Observe, opposite the York Hotel.—Portability, combined with great power in FIELD, RACE-COURSE, THEATRE, and general out-door day and night POCKET TELESCOPES, packed PERSPECTIVE GLASSES, weighing only four ounces, each containing 6, 7, and 8 achromatic lenses, constructed of German glass, will show distinctly a person's countenance at 2½ and 3 miles. They serve equally well on the Race-course, and at the Opera-house. Country scenery and ships are clearly seen at 8 to 10 miles They are also invaluable for Shooting, Deer-stalking, and Yachting. Her Majesty's Coast-Guard are now making use of them as day and night glasses, in preference to all others; they have also become in general use by Noblemen and Gentlemen of the Army and Navy, and by Sportsmen, Gentlemen, Gamekeepers, and Tourists. The most powerful and brilliant Telescope possessing such extraordinary power that some, 34 inches, with an extra astronomical eye-piece, will show distinctly Jupiter's moons, Saturn's ring, and the double stars, with the same Telescope can be seen a person's countenance three-and-a-half miles distant, and an object from fourteen to sixteen miles. All the above can be had of larger and all sizes, with increasing powers, and are secured by her Majesty's Royal Letters Patent.

EYESIGHT.—Optical Improvements, to enable all persons at once to read with ease, and to discriminate objects with perfect distinctness.—Messrs. SOLOMONS, Opticians, have invented and patented SPECTACLE LENSES of the greatest value and utility. The valuable advantage derived from this invention is that, instead of vision becoming strained, heated, weakened, and in numerous cases seriously injured, it is preserved and strengthened; and very aged persons are enabled to employ their sight at its natural power and clearness; can see with these lenses at a small less magnifying power, and they do not require the frequent change of glasses, the injurious effects of further powerful assistance. Persons can be suited at the most remote parts of the world by sending a pair of spectacles or one of the glasses out of them, in a letter, and stating the distance from the eyes they can read small print with it, and those who have not made use of spectacles by stating their age.—S. and H. SOLOMONS, Opticians, 39, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly, opposite the York Hotel.

DEAFNESS.—A newly-invented Instrument for extreme cases of Deafness, called the Sound Magnifier, Organic Vibrator, and invisible Vocal Conductor. It fits so into the ear as not to be seen by the most inquisitive examination of singing noises in the head is entirely removed. It affords instant relief to the deafest persons, and enables them to hear distinctly as church and at public assemblies.—Messrs. SOLOMONS, Opticians and Aurists, 39, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly, opposite the York Hotel.

INFANTS' NEW FEEDING BOTTLES, on the SYPHON PRINCIPLE.—"We have seldom seen anything so beautiful as the Feeding-Bottles introduced by Mr ELAM," 196, Oxford-street. Whether for weaning, rearing by hand, or occasional feeding, they are quite unrivalled. 7s. 6d. each

LADIES NURSING.—NEW NIPPLE SHIELDS, for taking away all pain in nursing, preventing, and immediately curing, cracked or sore nipples BENJAMIN ELAM, 196, Oxford-street. Price 2s. 6d. extra.

LIGHT BROWN COD LIVER OIL has now, in consequence of its marked superiority over every other variety, become the only Cod Liver Oil prescribed almost universal preference of the most eminent Medical Practitioners as the most speedy and effectual remedy for CONSUMPTION, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, GOUT, RHEUMATISM, NERVOUS AFFECTIONS, DISORDERS of the SKIN, SCROFULA, DISEASES of the FEMALE SYSTEM, GENERAL DEBILITY, and ALL SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS

Its lasting distinctive characteristics are—

INVARIABLE PURITY and UNIFORM STRENGTH,

ENTIRE RETENTION of its NATURAL FLAVOUR and AFTER-TASTE,

RAPID CURATIVE EFFECTS, AND CONSEQUENT ECONOMY.

OPINION OF A. B. GRANVILLE, ESQ., M.D., F.R.S., Author of "The Spas of Germany" and "The Spas of England,"

"On Sudden Death, &c., &c.

"Dr Granville has used Dr DE JONGH'S Light-Brown Cod Liver Oil extensively in his practice, and has found it not only efficacious, but eminently to be depended upon. It is to be preferable in many cases to Oils sold without the guarantee of such an authority as Dr DE JONGH. DR. GRANVILLE HAS FOUND THAT THE PARTICULAR KIND PREPARED BY DR DE JONGH IS NOT ONLY FREE FROM THE IRRITATION OTHERS, AND THAT IT DOES NOT CAUSE THE NAUSEA AND INDIGESTION SO COMMONLY COMPLAINED OF BY THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE PALE NEW FOUNDLAND OILS. The Oil being moreover, much more palatable, Dr. Granville's patients have themselves expressed a preference for Dr de Jongh's Light-Brown Cod Liver Oil."

PERSIA AND CHINA.

PEACE, or the "simulacrum" of it, once more reigns in Europe; but how long it is to last no one can tell. In the mean time the people of these islands will be thankful for its blessings, present and prospective, although they may not be able to free themselves of the misgiving, or argue with the presentiment, that the social state of the Continent is as full of dangerous combustibles as Etna or Vesuvius; and that the ambition, vanity, obstinacy, or fatuousness of more than one Potentate, or the merest popular accident, may once again let loose the elements of disorder, and undo all the deft handiwork of the Parisian diplomatists.

Yet, whatever may be the future reserved for Europe, it is clear that Great Britain has only shuffled, or been shuffled, out of a war in one quarter of the world, to find herself engaged in two wars in another. Unfortunately, neither of them is likely to be a small one, nor to excite at home an amount of enthusiasm equal to that excited by the more intelligible, palpable, and clearly-understood war against Russia. It has often been made a reproach against the people of this country that they neither cared for, nor comprehended, the politics of Europe. The war just concluded enabled them to refute the disparaging assertion. We fear, however, that the similar reproach levelled at them for ignorance of, and indifference to, the politics of their own great and magnificent empire in Asia has a better foundation; and that Persia, India, and China, and the manner in which they may be severally affected towards this country by the ambitious intrigues of the only other European Power which is recognised in Asia, are but vague ideas to the majority of the British people. A portion of the "upper ten thousand" of Parliamentary and literary life may understand these things. Let us hope that their knowledge may be duly and honestly communicated to the people, and that the real causes and true import of the wars in which the nation suddenly finds itself engaged with two celebrated empires of the East may be made as clear, patent, and intelligible, as the causes and objects of that great war nearer home which has just been brought to an honourable, if not to a glorious, termination.

The wars of Europe are complicated. No one Power can undertake hostilities against another without alarming the susceptibilities of many nations, and endangering the thrones of many monarchs. In such wars England has no other part to play than to endeavour to maintain the equilibrium of the system—to be the peacemaker of the Continental commonwealth—to throw her moral weight into the scale when rival ambitions contend for the mastery, or the wrongheadedness of a quasi-maniac, like him who wears the crown of the Two Sicilies, endangers the safety of all, and the existence of some, of his neighbours. When England is without allies, she can and does remonstrate with the unjust aggressor, because she has no ambition of her own to gratify, and desires no extension of territory. When she is in alliance with other nations she can and does, when remonstrance has been found ineffectual, try the ulterior might that lies in the sword. But in Asia her position is wholly different. There are no complications in that quarter: she stands face to face with many enemies, and must hold her own against all comers—be they whomsoever they will—or she incurs the risk of expulsion from the greatest, richest, and noblest empire ever possessed by a nation in ancient or modern times. England rules India by the might and terror of her name. To brook insult in Asia is to encourage it. To forgive it in one enemy, is to attract that enemy and another at his back, to renew the aggression. Sharp, short, and decisive must be her behaviour in war if she would retain India. Just, but inflexible, must be her conduct in peace, if she would prevent war and govern the people with advantage to them or to herself. The cherished maxims of European policy do not always apply to the East. The only fit emblem of government in those regions is the sharp sword in the strong arm—the sword of Nemesis as well as of Bellona. The constitutional and liberty-loving people of England may not, without making some wry faces, resign themselves to be the agents of a despotism in the East; but, unless they are prepared to resign India—and where is the Englishman who would consent to such an unparalleled act of suicide, and which would have no other result than to ruin both England and India, and to make Russia the undisputed mistress both of the East and the West?—they must allow India to be governed on Indian principles, and support the Government in India and at home, in the measures which, after mature consideration, may be deemed necessary for the security of the frontier, for the punishment of native potentates who either break faith, or are instigated in the interest and by the agents of Russia. Of course the British people must be persuaded that the Government is in the right in its quarrels both with Persia and with China before they will give it that steady and hearty support which is worth more than an army in gaining a victory. They must also be persuaded that the Government, with a rightful cause of quarrel, is taking the right means of bringing the quarrel to a speedy and an honourable issue, or they will withhold the support on a secondary point, which they would gladly have accorded on the general principle. We have already expressed our own conviction that the two wars in which we are unluckily engaged at this moment in Asia have been forced upon the country by uncontrollable circumstances and inevitable necessity; that the policy of these wars cannot, and ought not to, be judged by the European standard; that we cannot submit to insult in the East without inviting insult—to outrage without asking for outrage; and that to lose prestige is to lose a power a hundred times stronger to defend us than any army or any navy we have ever yet maintained in those regions. We doubt not that the Government, as soon as Parliament shall have reassembled, will be well able to explain and to defend its whole policy, Chinese and Persian; and will make out such a case as will entitle it to ask and to receive the hearty support both of Parliament and people. But let it, if it would prosper and allow the country to prosper, beware of the almost fatal error committed at the outset of the war against Russia. Let it beware of half measures. Let it not encourage the delusion of rose-water hostilities. Let it not start with the assertion that it will not, in case of need, annex territories, and that it will not inflict the utmost possible amount of damage upon the foe, as long as the foe shall remain in arms and brave the forces that we bring to bear against him. In Asiatic wars we must either beat or be beaten. No diplomacy can interfere in those regions between the victor and the vanquished, and to render nugatory all the painful sacrifices of war. It is enough for England that she does not seek war in the East, and that she accepts it with regret. Let it be enough for her enemies, in braving her power, to find that they have incurred the necessary penalty of punishment. Oriental perfidy, combined as it may be with Russian intrigue, is no match for this great nation, which knows both its rights and its power, and is prepared to maintain both at all hazards.

LADAK.

THIS strongely-built town is situated in a district which becomes interesting in connection with our war with Persia. Ladak is the capital of Little Thibet, and is almost four miles from the right bank of the Indus, which is here almost fifty yards wide. The town is built at the foot of a hill, on the top of which are the remains of an old fort. It is connected with the town by a ruined wall running along the ridge of the hill, till it reaches a large and conspicuous-looking house belonging to the head man of the place. Beneath, spreading to the right and left, are from three hundred to four hundred houses, all built of stone to a height some ten or twelve feet from the ground, and thence to the top of the house of sunburnt bricks, the latter white-washed. The inhabitants are a strange mixture of Tartars, Affghans, Cashmerins, Chinese, and almost every other nation under the sun. There seems to be little or no trade beyond ponies and Yarkand horses.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, Thursday.

PARIS has at last decided on entering into its winter campaign of gaieties a step long deferred, pour des raisons, as they say here, when those reasons are "easier imagined than described." Still, comparatively few private houses seem to be opened; and, in general, the Court, the Ministères, and the Embassies, chiefly keep up the ball or balls.

The last fête at the Tuileries was marked by (if possible) a greater extravagance than ever in the cost and circumference of the dresses. The Empress's costume no crinoline could possibly have supported, so enormous was the extent, and so solid the substructure. The dress was a petticoat of white tulle, with three skirts bouillonné; a tunic of sky-blue velvet, trimmed with tulle puffings and large gold beads; and a head-dress of blue foliage, surmounted by a diamond tiara—all of which, of course, became her Majesty.

The marriage of M. de Morny continues to be one of the chief topics of conversation in the salons here. The bride is seventeen, and is very beautiful, says the chronicle, aloud; but it afterwards adds, lowering its tone discreetly, that she holds a very close tie of consanguinity to the Imperial family; that this is quite admitted by the children of the late Emperor, that this was the real motive of the Czar and Czarina's presence at the wedding, and that Alexander accords her an annual pension of 150,000 francs. Further, the chronicle adds—still in the same tone—that the union in question has been the cause of what is expressively denominated a violent to-do as regards a certain fair widow, a neighbour of the bridegroom, who for many years has been bound to him by ties, not only of affection, but of interest, their fortunes, chiefly proceeding from the result of successful speculations undertaken in common ever since the Revolution of 1848, being so united that it becomes extremely difficult to arrive at a satisfactory and equitable division thereof. Previously to the announcement of his intended union, M. de Morny is said to have sent to Mdme. le H., the lady in question, a present of diamonds and turquoises to the amount of four millions of francs. It seems, however, that this magnificent propitiatory offering was not found sufficient to appease the offended fair, who, on receiving the intelligence of the intended marriage, immediately demanded an interview with the Emperor, and spent an hour and a half in explaining to the Sovereign her wrongs and grievances. We have not learned if they are likely to receive redress from him.

The chief hon of the season is an attaché of the Russian Embassy, the Prince Jousoupoff, who, possessed of a colossal fortune, proposes to devote a portion of it to astonishing the natives of the "capital of the civilised world." For this purpose he has taken the magnificent hotel of M. Solomon Rothschild, and, while he and the Princess (whose pearls and diamonds have already dazzled the eyes of all Paris) are on a visit to the Empress Dowager of Russia, it is being fitted up for a series of receptions which——but let us wait till they be given ere we attempt to collect all the superlatives necessary to render justice to so vast a subject.

Of a far different class of interest has been that excited by the trial and condemnation of the assassin Verger. During the whole of the legal proceedings the violence of his words and demeanour, and the impossibility of making him listen to the examinations instead of constantly attacking each speaker, more than once rendered his removal necessary. On hearing his condemnation he burst forth into violent invectives. He never seems to have manifested the slightest remorse or regret for the fearful crime of which he has been the perpetrator, and yet, strange to say—notwithstanding his unruly conduct, his vehemence, and his utter mental blindness—it cannot, properly speaking, be said that he manifests any real signs of insanity; but he appears to have been driven on throughout by a fierce, vindictive, natural perversity and ferocity, which no better or more reasonable feeling has arisen to control. He has demanded to petition the Emperor for his pardon, and seems to have little or no idea of the reasons that would render its accordance unlikely.

The Persian Ambassador, Ferrukh Kahn, and his suite have arrived in Paris, and taken a portion of the hotel of the Comte Jules de Lesseps, in the Champs Elysées.

A fresh legal summons has been issued against M. Eugène de Miracourt, whose "Biographies Contemporaines" have already excited so many contradictions and refutations, and, we believe, more than one trial. M. Gustave Planche is this time the plaintiff.

At the church of St. Laurent has just been executed a curious specimen of Roman Catholic ecclesiastical decoration. It represents a stable, seven metres by three and three quarters in extent. In the centre sits the Virgin, offering the infant Jesus to the homage of the kneeling angels, the shepherds, and the magi: all the figures, which are about a metre and a quarter in height, are painted in vivid colours, relieved with gilding. A variety of birds and beasts are introduced into the group, and the whole is surrounded with a sort of frame of ivy, holly, evergreens, and moss.

The Presse has, under its new head, introduced a fresh feature; namely, a "Weekly Courrier de Paris," from the pen of M. Nestor Roqueplan. It is publishing at present a feuilleton by Madame George Sand, an Italian story, entitled "Daniella."

A singular discovery has been made by some workmen in levelling the ground in the Rue des Ecoles. This consists of a number of rough-hewn stone coffins, containing the remains of half-pulverised skeletons, and four earthen vases, painted in red, with a rude imitation of flams. These latter were immediately transported to the museum of the Palais de Cluny, and the director of the establishment examined all the remains on the spot, but found neither inscription nor date that could afford any clue to the period to which they belonged. They are evidently, however, of great antiquity.

MM. Félicien David and Louis Paulin propose to hold, on the 1st and 15th February, and 1st, 15th, and 29th March, morning concerts at the Salle d'Erard, for the execution of classical and modern music, from the works of Palestrina and Orlando de Lassus up to those of the first contemporary masters. The French version of the "Trovatore," "Le Trouvère," at the Grand Opera, has had a considerable success, but not one that is at all likely to dethrone the original work; nor are the artists who render it capable of making us for a moment forget its Italian representatives. The Opera is rehearsing a new work by M. Membrée, "Les Enfans sans souci;" and an opera in five acts, by MM. St. Georges and Halévy, entitled "La Magicienne," has been accepted. Mdmes. Lauters and Borghi-Mamo are to have the chief rôles therein.

SETTLEMENT OF THE SWISS AFFAIR.

Baron Manteuffel has stated to the Chambers that the release of the Neufchâtel prisoners has been unconditional (so far as Prussia is concerned). This, he adds, has removed the question of war. The solution of other points must be left to the discussion of the diplomatic conferences with the European Powers.

A letter from Berlin of the 16th says:—

A despatch was received last evening from Berne announcing the release of the prisoners unconditionally, and it has produced great satisfaction. In the interval which will pass between the present moment and that at which conferences will definitively solve the affair of Neufchâtel our journals appear disposed to attack England and Austria with violence. On account of their attitude having of late not been favourable to Prussia. One of our semi-official journals, the Zeit, is attacking England, and the Prussian Correspondance Austria.

The Prussian Government has lost no time in informing its representatives abroad, by a circular despatch, of its willingness to enter into negotiations for the settlement of the sovereignty question. The despatch is dated the 17th inst., and was sent off that day.

SARDINIAN PARLIAMENT. THE PIEDMONTESE FOREIGN POLICY.

The Opinions of the 16th inst. contains an interesting account of the discussion in the Chamber of Deputies on the foreign policy of the Government. M. Brofferio, the leading Radical deputy, had made a flaming speech on the present state of Italy, in which he expressed great dissatisfaction with the results of the alliance with the Western Powers; to which Count Cavour replied in a speech which is said to have been one of the most effective Parliamentary discourses ever heard in that house. As regards the revolutionary party, he drew a well marked line between their policy and that of the King of Sardinia:—

It is not we (said Count Cavour) who ever encourage incomplete movements or senseless revolutionary attempts; we understand otherwise the regeneration of the country, and our policy will always be frank and loyal. So long as we possess the confidence of the Italian States, we shall not have recourse to revolutionary agencies. Before inflaming and carrying out revolutions we shall declare war. As to the lamentable incidents which have occurred in Naples, and which M. Brofferio reminds us, I repudiate them emphatically, and I protest against them in the interests of Italy (Bravos). Such acts do not belong to the Italian party, but to wretched and miserable men who deserve pity. We ought to be stigmatised and condemned by whoever has the honour and the future of Italy at heart. I owe here a sincere confession to the Chamber. In politics I do not believe in panacea, and I have never made much account of them. My policy is as hard to teach us that events arise without any provision. To make appositions is inopportune and ridiculous. Is it wished to know our principles? It is not difficult. Since Victor Emmanuel ascended the throne, the Government has always sought to develop liberty at home, and to advance the highest welfare of Italy abroad. Such are the principles which caused us to participate in the war, which have gained us in the Conference, and to which we shall keep in the future (Bravos). But you exclaim:—Where are the advantages?" Behold them! If the war and the Congress have not produced material results for Italy, they have, at least, given it an immense moral result. Beyond the Alps Italy was very severely judged. I appeal herein to all who have been abroad, and I evidence the unjust opinions of nations who have had sympathies for Italy, such as Byron and Macaulay. To them Italy was a beautiful but unhappy lady, having a barbarous and tyrannical husband, and unable to govern the family. The policy adopted by Piedmont, and the part she has taken in the war and in the councils of Europe, have modified public opinion. I appeal on this point to the Liberal press of France, England, and Germany, and to the opinions of those who have travelled through Europe within the last few months. To-day, with all generous hearts, an Italian or a Sardinian is beyond the Alps an object of esteem and sympathy. He who has faith in brutal force alone may laugh at such a result as a trifling matter; but it will not be so with those who have faith in progress, public opinion, and the force of ideas (Bravos). I know that these brief explanations will not convert the party Brofferio, but they will prove, at least, that our—I would say your—policy has not been barren. In the Congress of Paris seeds have been sown which will be made fruitful by time and the virtues of Italians.

The language and the opinions expressed by Count Cavour from the tribune were precisely those enounced by him at the Congress of Paris; his speech, consequently, has a political bearing, which was not lost on his audience. Count Mamiani likewise delivered a very eloquent speech, which was greatly applauded, in which he enumerated, with great perspicuity, the practical results already obtained during the eight months which have elapsed since the European Powers officially proclaimed that the Italian question is a question of order and of peace.

AMERICA.

By the Royal mail steam-ship Europa, which arrived at Liverpool on Sunday, we have intelligence from New York to the 7th instant.

Mr. Bright, the President of the Senate, had resigned his post, in order that he might proceed to Indianopolis to superintend his own affairs. Mr. Mason had been appointed to succeed him. In the House of Representatives a vain attempt had been made to report a bill increasing the pay of the officers of the army. Mr. Boyce, Democrat, of South Carolina, had given notice of an amendment he intends offering to the Tariff Bill. He proposes that from and after January, 1857, all goods, wares, merchandise, and other products subject under the existing tariff to pay a duty of 20 per cent, shall continue to be admitted at that rate, and that tea and coffee shall be included in the same schedule.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Herald states that there is some foundation for a report "that Vanderbilt has dispatched an agent to negotiate a loan of three millions of dollars, provided the funds are used in exterminating Walker from Nicaragua. It is understood that the Administration are aware of the movement, and the object of it is to defeat Walker, that Vanderbilt may get possession of steam-boats and other property which formerly belonged to the old Transit Company, for Marcy informed Vanderbilt when he was here that he could take his property wherever he might find it."

Nothing has yet been done with the Clarendon and Dallas treaty; and it is not unlikely that the discussion of this important document will be reserved for the extra session, which meets soon after the 4th of March. The final fate of the treaty is as doubtful as ever: and, if Walker should be still even the nominal master of Nicaragua when the treaty is up for discussion, there will be a powerful effort on the part of the Southern Senators to defeat it. The adoption of the treaty would kill Walker's military rule entirely, and the South will, therefore, fight for him manfully. In the event, however, of Walker's certain overthrow before the debate on the subject, the treaty would have a good chance of ratification, as it would also of acceptance by the regular and legalised Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua. The signing of the treaty all round would preserve the Nicaragua Isthmus, and the port of San Juan, from any further hostile demonstrations, inasmuch as the control of the same would be in the hands of England and the United States jointly: and it is not likely that any Filibuster movements would be attempted against so powerful a combination.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE MANCHESTER PARTY.—The annual meeting of the Manchester party is announced for the 29th inst. Neither Mr. Cobden nor Mr. Bright will be present this year; but the Right Hon. T. M. Gibson, M.P.; Mr. Horace Seymour, M.P.; Mr. John Cheetham, M.P.; and Mr. George Hadfield, M.P., have promised to take part in the proceedings. The meeting is announced as one of Free-traders and Friends of Political Progress; and Mr. George Wilson is to preside.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES, IRELAND.—The Government, it is said, is about to issue a commission at the head of which Mr Temple is likely to be placed—for the purpose of inquiry into the internal economy, curricula of education, and attendance of the several presidents and professors, and the several rules and regulations which govern each of the Queen's Colleges, with a view to their modification and improvement.

MEMORIAL OF MR. BROTHERTON, M.P.—A meeting of the inhabitants of Salford was held on Monday last, at which it was determined to erect a memorial of the late Mr. Brotherton, in the Peel Park, but the nature of it was left for consideration until it was seen what amount of money could be raised. Fourteen gentlemen put down their names for £50 each, and altogether about £1000 was subscribed at the meeting.

THE WAR AGAINST CHINA AND PERSIA.—A public meeting of the inhabitants of Birmingham was held in the Music-hall, Birmingham, on Monday night—Mr. Alderman Baldwin in the chair—to take into consideration the present Persian and Chinese wars. Among those present were Mr Joseph Sturge, and other members of the Peace party. A letter was read from Lord Lyttelton, condemning the war with Persia and the bombardment of the Canton forts. Mr. W. Morgan, who moved the first resolution, deprecating the recent hostilities against China, expressed an opinion that, like the last war against China, they had arisen out of a contraband trade in opium. He reviewed the history and general condition of that question, after entering into various details to show the injurious effects of the traffic in opium, quoted the official correspondence from the London Gazette, and expressed an opinion that we had not a clear ground of quarrel against the Chinese on the present occasion. All the circumstances, he said, proved that the sudden resort to arms could not be justified. The Rev. C. Vince, who seconded the resolution, said that the proceedings of the British fleet had been hurried and precipitate, and that the conflict was as unmanly as it was unjustifiable (Cheers). This resolution, and one condemning the war against Persia, were agreed to, and petitions to both Houses of Parliament founded upon them were adopted.

WORKING MAN'S INSTITUTION, BECCLES.—The first anniversary meeting of this institution was celebrated on the evening of Tuesday, the 13th inst. At the general meeting of the members the committee produced their report of the proceedings of the past year, by which it appeared that the receipts had amounted to £87 12s. 11d; and the expenses to £83 8s. 10d; leaving a balance in hand of £3 4s. 1d. After electing officers for the present year, &c., a vote of thanks was passed to the Corporation for their munificent annual donation of £20; and to the Mayor (G. Penn, Esq.), without whose energetic assistance it was unanimously accorded that the institution would never have been established. At the close of the business the members adjourned to the spacious assembly-room, which had been tastefully decorated for the occasion with festoons of shrubs, flags, and other embellishments. A large party of both sexes and all classes of the inhabitants, including several mechanics and agricultural labourers, were present. In the centre of the room was placed a table covered with specimens of natural history and models of mechanical apparatus. In the course of the evening the Rev. John Flower addressed the meeting; Mr. Hewitt gave a short lecture on the "Food and Nutrition of Plants." There was also the vocal and instrumental performance of an amateur band, under the excellent superintendence of Mr. and Mrs. Corbyn. Refreshments of tea, coffee, sandwiches, &c., were served at intervals; and at eleven o'clock the company separated, highly delighted with the evening's entertainment.

FREEHOLD MOVEMENT IN SCOTLAND.—A movement was lately commenced in Edinburgh and its influence extended to other Scotch towns, having for its objects the extension of the Parliamentary franchise to the proprietors in counties of freeholds yielding a clear rental of 40s. as in England; the conferring on the £10 householders in burghs the right to vote in their respective counties; and the extension of the English system of registration to the Scottish counties, for which a bill was introduced during the last session, and which, it is said, will be again introduced during the present session, but which, being opposed by the Scotch county members, was then restricted to the burghs. Two public meetings on the subject have been held in Edinburgh, addressed by the Rev. Dr. Begg, a Free Church clergyman, Mr. Duncan M'Laren, and other leaders of the movement; and at the last meeting of the Town Council resolutions were carried, without a division, in favour of the movement, although several members recorded their dissent from the proposal to introduce freehold burgh votes into the county representation. The movement is promoted chiefly by the "tenant" section of the Free Church, seeing generally favourable to a large extension of the suffrage, desire to equalise the privileges of the franchise in England and Scotland, as well as ultimately to secure a wider basis of representation. The design has also been very openly expressed that by means of the freehold system the Conservative influence which prevails in about three-fourths of the counties of Scotland should be overpoised, not by the small but the burgh freeholders. The change is likewise advocated as an important means of social elevation of the working classes, and a deputation from Birmingham and London is at present on a Scottish tour explaining the operation and results of the freehold land societies established of late years in some of the English midland counties.

A STRIKE OF CHORISTERS.—A strike of a rather novel character occurred the other day in the church of St. George's, Somersetshire. It appears that the Vicar's lady, by way of inducing some of the children to lend their choral aid in the service of the church, has been in the habit of rewarding the most diligent and attention by an annual gift of one shilling each, payable at the commencement of the year. From some circumstance which had transpired, the usual shilling this year was withheld from the choristers, which on Sunday morning five of the youthful choir "struck" their singing. By evening service the number of malcontents was increased to seven, and the church being consequently left almost without a chorister, a promise was made that the shilling should be forthcoming. Even then, however, the youthful rebels, practically mindful of some such maxim as "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," remained obdurate, until they should be actually put in possession of that which they considered to be their due.

A SHAMEFUL CASE.—A case has lately been brought before the magistrates of Birkenhead which in atrocity will almost bear comparison with the doings of the buccaneers of old. It appears that the J. L. Bogart, an American ship, lying in the Mersey, was about to proceed to Mobile, and required a ship's company. On Sunday last she was all ready for sea, wanting only the necessary number of hands to take her out, when a boat with some sailors was seen passing her. The boat hailed her, and asked if she were the Robin Hood (a British vessel), bound for Antigua. The reply was in the affirmative, and the sailors boarded her. The mistake was soon discovered by the seamen, but the officers of the ship refused to part with them, claiming them as their own ship's company. The scene which followed may be readily imagined, as several of the unwilling crew were coloured men, who, on being made acquainted with the ship's destination, immediately saw that a prison, and probably slavery, awaited them on the other side of the Atlantic. They claimed their release; this was refused to them. A fight, which has been designated a mutiny, took place. The police were called in, and a number of the crew were taken into custody. On Tuesday the Birkenhead magistrates commenced an investigation into the disturbance. The charge of mutiny could not be entertained by the Birkenhead authorities; but so far as the evidence with regard to the affray itself was adduced, it appeared that the officers had behaved in a most brutal manner to many of the crew, and that all the latter who took part in the disturbance were men who had shipped for another vessel—the Robin Hood—and had been induced to go on board the J. L. Bogart by false representations of the second mate, Peter Campbell, who, with it of the crew, was in custody in the court. It was elicited, during the further examination of the pilot, that seven shots in all were fired by the first and second mates, and that the latter (P. Campbell) expressed his regret that the first mate fired over the heads of the crew instead of at them, stating that also that he had carefully aimed, for he would have shot every one of them. It also appeared from the evidence of the cabin-boy that the crew were perfectly quiet before the mutiny broke out, though apparently angry that they had been deceived with regard to the vessel. The magistrates decided to remand three of the sailors who were positively identified as having had arms in their hands, together with the second mate, and to discharge the rest of the prisoners. Sir Edward Cust remarked that, so far as the Bench could see, the crew were not the originators of the disturbance, but that they had been deceived with regard to the vessel in which they had shipped. A warrant has been issued for the apprehension of the boatswain.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND.

HIS GRACE JOHN HENRY MANNERS, K.G., fifth Duke of Rutland, and Marquis of Granby, in the county of Nottingham, Earl of Rutland, and Baron Manners of Haddon, in the county of Derby, in the Peerage of England, Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Leicestershire, High Steward of Cambridge, a Trustee of the British Museum, and Governor of King's College, London, was the eldest son of Charles, fourth Duke, and Lady Mary Isabella Somerset, youngest daughter of Charles Noel, fourth Duke of Beaufort. He was born on the 4th January, 1778, and, when nine years old, succeeded to the family honours and estates on the decease on Dublin, on the 24th Oct., 1787) of his father, Charles, the fourth Duke, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He married, the 22nd April, 1799, Lady Elizabeth Howard, fifth daughter of Frederick, fifth Earl of Carlisle, the grandfather of his Excellency the present Earl; by which lady, who died the 29th Nov., 1825, he had issue three sons and four daughters, viz.—Charles Cecil John, Marquis of Granby, his successor; Lord John Manners M.P., who is married to Catherine Louisa, daughter of the late Colonel Manley, C.B.; Lord George Manners, only daughter of the late Admiral Hon. George Anson; Lady Adelaide Matilda Fitzalan Howard, youngest daughter of the late Duke of Norfolk; Lady Elizabeth Frederica, the wife of Andrew Robert Drummond, Esq.; Lady Emmeline Charlotte Elizabeth, the present, who died the widow of the Hon. Charles Wentworth Fitzwilliam, in 1855; Lady Katherine Isabella, who was married to Frederick Wortley, in 1855; and the Lady Adelina Elizabeth Gertrude, the wife of William Earl Jermyn; and the Lady Adelina Elizabeth Gertrude, the wife of her cousin, the Rev. F. I. Norman, Rector of Bottesford, Leicestershire.

The Duke of Rutland was known to be one of the best landlords in England, and was deservedly popular amongst his numerous tenants. He was for many years a princely patron of the turf, and was ardently attached to the sports of the field. His Grace took an active part in politics. On all important questions arising in the House of Lords he invariably voted with the Conservative party. The Duke, who had been a Knight of the Garter for more than fifty years, was the senior Knight of the order, and was next to Lord Beresford in point of precedence. Lord Lieutenant, and is succeeded by his eldest son, Charles Cecil John, Marquis of Granby, M.P. for the county of Leicester, Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Lincolnshire, now sixth Duke of Rutland, who was born the 6th May, 1815, and who has sat in the House of Commons for Stamford from 1837 till July, 1852, when he was elected for North Leicestershire on the retirement of his uncle, the late General Lord Charles Manners.

[A Portrait of the Duke of Rutland will be found in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, for Dec. 9, 1843.]

SIR HUGH R. HOARE, BART.

SIR HUGH RICHARD HOARE, fourth Baronet, of Stourhead, Wilts, and Lillington-Dayrell, Bucks, who was the son of Sir Henry Hugh Hoare, the third Baronet, by his wife, Maria Palmer, daughter of Arthur Acland, Esq., of Fairfield, and was the nephew of Sir Richard Colt Hoare, F.S.S., F.L.S., the second Baronet, the celebrated antiquary, and author of the "History of Ancient and Modern Wiltshire," was born the 29th November, 1781, and married, the 23rd of April, 1819, Ann, daughter of Thomas Tyrwhitt Drake, of Shardeloes, Bucks. He succeeded, as fourth Baronet, on the demise of his father, the 16th August, 1841. His own death occurred at his seat, Stourhead, in Wiltshire, on the 10th inst., and, as he had no issue, the Baronetcy passes to his nephew, Henry Ainslie Hoare, of Wavendon House, Bucks, now the fifth Baronet, who married, the 15th April, 1846, Augusta Frances Anne, daughter of the late Sir Edmund George Clayton East, Bart., and has issue. The family of Hoare,

Baronets of Stourhead, springs from Sir Richard Hoare, Knight, Lord Mayor of London in 1712, through his third son, Henry Hoare, Esq., who is a flourishing banking-house in Fleet-street. founded the business and still flourishing banking-house in Fleet-street. The family has now for a century and a half been continually engaged in business, has also distinguished itself in literature and in many public ways, and is further remarkable for the numerous matrimonial alliances it has formed with the titled aristocracy.

REAR-ADMIRAL ROGERS.

REAR-ADMIRAL ROBERT HENLEY ROGERS was born in August, 1783, at Blachford House, near Cornwood, Devon. He was the third son of the late Sir Frederick Rogers, Bart., M.P. for and Recorder of Plymouth, by his wife, Jane, daughter of John Lillicrap, Esq., a naval officer at Gibraltar, and was grandson of Sir Frederick Rogers, Bart., Commissioner of the Dockyard at Plymouth, and Recorder of that borough, who married the widow of Vice-Admiral Durell, and died in 1772. Admiral Rogers was also brother of the late Sir Frederick Roman Rogers, Bart., Chief Inspector of the Audit Office, Somerset House, and of Lieut.-General Wm. Cooper Rogers, late of the 2nd Dragoon Guards; and was also of the present Sir Frederick Rogers, Bart., one of the Commissioners of Emigration. The gallant Admiral entered the Royal Navy in the spring of 1796, as first-class volunteer, on board the Concorde, 36, Capt. Anthony Hunt, and was in constant service during the succeeding years of the French war. On the 17th June, 1809, he went as Senior Lieutenant on board the Rota, 38, Captain Charles Malcolm; and for his conduct in this ship, in the Channel and on the north coast of Spain, he was promoted, on the 1st of February, 1812, to the rank of Commander. His last appointment was to the Dover troop-ship, the command of which he retained from the 30th July, 1814, until the 6th August, 1816. During the long period of his active employment, Rogers, besides visiting the West Indies and Baltic, accompanied the expedition against New Orleans, where he fought on shore in the breaching-batteries, and in command of a body of seamen, and was particularly noticed for his exertions by Sir Edward Thomas Troubridge. He attained the rank of Captain the 22nd September, 1846, and accepted the retirement 1st October, 1846. On the 11th June, 1851, he was placed on the list of Retired Rear-Admirals. He died at his residence, Citadel-road, Plymouth, on the 8th inst. He was never married.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL EVANS

BRIGADIER GENERAL DACRES EVANS, C.B., COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF EVANS was the son of the late Admiral Andrew F. Evans. He entered the military service of the East India Company at the usual early age, in 1826, and was posted to the 16th N.I. (Grenadiers), in which he served several years as Adjutant. In the Afghan campaign he accompanied Major-General Nott's force from Candahar to Cabool, and was present at the second capture of the Fort of Ghuznee, in 1839, when he commanded his regiment, and for this service obtained the medal and rank of Brevet Major. On the breaking out of the Sikh war he was with his regiment at the battle of Moodkee, in 1845, for which he received a brevet majority. During several years Brigadier-General Evans held a staff appointment, on the nomination of Lord Ellenborough, in the East India Company's studs at Hauppur and Kharunda-Dhee. On his return to England he volunteered his aid in the Russian war, and was in 1855 appointed to a brigade of the Turkish Contingent, under General Vivian. Brigadier-General Evans, who on all occasions showed himself to be an able and indefatigable officer, died at Clifton, on the 20th ult.

COMMANDER HALL.

COMMANDER HENRY JOHN HALL, who died at Blackheath-terrace, on the 4th instant, was the second and last surviving son of the Rev Dr. Hall, of Alloa, N.B., by his wife, Frances Estcourt, daughter of Richard Cresswell, Esq., of Ainwick, Northumberland. The late Commander Hall entered the Royal Navy in August, 1808, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Macnamara Russell, in the North Sea and Baltic, and assisted at the capture of Heligoland, in 1807, which he was selected as Aide-de-Camp to Captain Tucker. The period of his quitting the Majestic until promoted to the rank of Lieutenant the 21st March, 1812), he was constantly and meritoriously engaged on various stations. At the breaking out of the war with Russia, he was selected on account of his nautical skill and mercantile abilities to be official arbitrator to the London agents of the French Minister of War, Messrs Pastrie (Bordeaux), to settle claims for damage to British and American ships in the French Transport Service. Commander Hall had retired in 1854, under the Order of Council of 1836. He leaves a widow and three children, two sons and a daughter. The eldest son, Henry John Hall, is married to Rosa, third daughter of John Ledger, Esq., of Shooter's-hill, a magistrate for the county of Surrey.

LIEUTENANT MAUDE

LIEUTENANT THOMAS FRANCIS MAUDE, of the 15th Hussars, who, to the great grief of his family and friends, died on the 10th instant, of gastric fever, after a short illness, at his father's Deanery House, Clogher, was in his 28th year, and was the eldest son of the Hon and Rev. Dean Maude, by his wife, Mary Elizabeth Martha, eldest daughter of the Hon Francis Aldborough Prittie. Lieut. Maude was also first cousin of the present Viscount Hawarden.

WILLS.—The will of the Most Noble George Ferrars, Marquis Townshend and Earl of Leicester, and that of the Right Hon. Lady Julia Stafford, have just been proved in London. The personalty of the latter is £80,000; Lavy, Esq., of Tavistock-square, was sworn under £250,000; W. Slark, Esq., of Cockspur-street, £30 000; J. A. Paris, M.D., of Dover-street, Piccadilly, £10,000; Miss B. A. Miller, of Southampton, £30,000; John Hewett, Esq., of Woburn-square, £35,000 who has bequeathed to St. Pancras Female School £100, London Hospital £100, King's College Hospital £100.

THE MURDER OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF PARIS.

Verger appeared before the Court of Assize of Paris on Saturday to take his trial for the murder of the Archbishop of Paris. On the table of the court were deposited the pièces de conviction—namely, the sacerdotal habiliments worn by the Archbishop at the moment. The stole, the surplice, the cope, the soutane displayed the rent made by the knife of the assassin, and were covered over and stuff with blood. The blade of the knife was also bloodstained for more than half its length. It is a formidable weapon—a Catalan knife, about eighteen inches long, with a blade of about ten inches, and an inch and a half wide. The view of these objects produced a thrill of horror in the crowd.

The prisoner was brought into court at twenty minutes to ten o'clock. He is thirty years of age, but looks younger. He is of middle stature, and fair in complexion. His features are regular and expressive. His forehead is high, though not broad. On the back of his head he might be seen the cerebral tumour, where the hair is shaved off to show the circumference of a five-franc piece. The prisoner, who was entirely dressed in black, was led in by the gendarmes, and advanced to the place assigned him with perfect self-possession. Resting in one hand a bundle of papers, he did not appear in the slightest degree intimidated, looked about on the crowd before and under him with the utmost calmness. stooped down for a moment to whisper something into the ear of his advocate, and then began to converse with the gendarme who was at his left. A Captain of the gendarmerie and a Lieutenant of the Paris Guard were with the guards stationed near the prisoner. At half-past ten o'clock the jury took their places, and the Judges their places on the bench. The Judges were MM. Delangle, Bonnidet de Jouvencourt, who presided, and M. Degurcenville. The official procureur Suisnac (who presided, and M. Degurcenville. The official procureur Suisnac (who presided, and M. Barbier, Avocat-General. M. Merle M. Laisse, Procureur-General, and M. Barbier, Avocat-General. M. Nogent de Saint Laurens had been named by the Court counsel for the prisoner, and took his place by his side. After some preliminary proceedings the interrogatoire, or examination, of the prisoner by the Court commenced. The Judge asked the prisoner his name. He replied in a firm voice, "Jean Louis Verger, Lord Lieutenant and Archbishop of Paris." "Your profession?" "Ecclesiastic." "Your age?" "Thirty years." "Where were you born?" "At Neuilly-sur-Seine." "Close to Paris." "Where was your last place of residence?" "At my brother's house in Paris, Rue de Sèvre, 66." The jurors then took the oaths, and the clerk (or greffier) of the court, being called on by the presiding Judge, commenced reading the acte d'accusation, or indictment.

The first part of the acte d'accusation contained nothing more than the particulars of the crime, with which our readers are already acquainted. It then gave some account of the prisoner's previous career. He was ordained priest at 25, and served in several rural parishes of the diocese. ordained priest at 25, and served in several rural parishes of the diocese. He was even then remarked for the restlessness, vanity, and ambition which form the principal traits in his character. Verger spent three years at the church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois. On first entering he was embarrassed with debt. M. Logrand advanced him 800 f. to assist in paying his creditors, and kindly gave him a room in the presbytery. Verger his creditors, and kindly gave him a room in the presbytery. Verger accepted the benefits, but, finding that his hopes of rapid promotion were not realised as speedily as he wished, he turned against his benefactors, and began to whisper the most odious calumnies against him. In August, 1855, his diocesan deprived him of his powers as a clergyman, and he was consequently obliged to quit the church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois. He spent some months in Paris after that occurrence. From day to day he wearied the Archbishop and the judicial authorities with his complaints and his accusations against the present of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, and successively denounced this last without any great scandal unless he readmitted him to the Church with an income to be fixed by himself. On the 12th of March he got appointed as assistant in the parish of Sceaux. New scandals, however, soon brought on him further severities. At the commencement of December, 1855, the Bishop of Meaux gave him a sentence of interdiction on the accused. This measure was announced to him by a letter, dated December 12, in which a friendly feeling is still expressed. Another letter from the Bishop was found on three causes:—1. The publication of a libel on a decree of the Court of Assize at Melun. 2. Sermons preached by Verger on the Immaculate Conception confided to the prisoner, and of the Immaculate Conception confided to the prisoner, and of the Immaculate Conception generally. 3. The discovery of a written pamphlet, entitled "Testament," filled with violent attacks on the dogmas of religion and against the temporal power of the violent attacks on the dogmas of religion and against the temporal power of the clastical discipline. Verger appears to have quitted Serris to come to Paris on the 26th of December, 1856. He pretends that he came to ask the Archbishop to remove the interdiction pronounced against him by the Bishop of Meaux, but he had already the idea of revenging himself by a crime entered his mind on the 26th of December, the day when a witness who was in communication with the accused received a letter from M. Sibour would not remove the interdiction, or even listen to his defence. The witness alluded to is M. Legeudi, who has been examined at length in the course of the present proceedings. It appears from his evidence that he expressed to Verger his mind. It appears from his evidence that he expressed to Verger his personal opinion on the justice of the interdiction. It does not appear from that moment he entertained in his heart the idea of an atrocious revenge; the idea of an assassination was, moreover, familiar to him. He related in one of his interrogatories that last year, after he had been dismissed from St. Germain l'Auxerrois, he had purchased a hatchet, with which to murder first the Archbishop and next the Abbé Legrand. Latterly he was armed with a dreadful weapon—a long Catalan knife, of which he made use as a last case, and which he says he purchased two months since for his personal defence. The death of the Archbishop was determined Verger has accomplished his execrable design, and he has repeated the details with the tranquillity which announces at the same time the most cool and cruel determination. He takes care, in his interrogatories, to declare that he was perfectly master of himself, and that "he knew well what he was doing." He gives a proof of it when he says that on Christmas day, when he went to the Church of St. Severin to hear the parish priest preach, he returned in the afternoon to vespers, and gave the priest a summary of his sermon, with his own remarks on it. On the 3rd January, the day of the crime, Verger went at two o'clock to the church of St. Etienne du Mont, carrying with him his Catalan knife. He first consulted the list of the ceremonies of the day; he then placed himself near a bench with the intention of striking the Archbishop when he should enter to hear the sermon. He was driven thence by the crowd of priests had been his fellow-students, whom he selected that many of the priests had been his fellow-students, and might, on recognising him, prevent the execution of his plan, he quitted the bench and placed himself in the nave at the pillar previously indicated. He was there when the Archbishop arrived, and remained there during the entire ceremony. At length he opened the knife, hiding it from every eye until his victim approached. "I did not strike twice," said the prisoner, "I was certain that the first blow had taken effect." I was determined that he was also to die by my hand." Regarding the emphatic tone the following words:—"It is now nineteen centuries since a curious word was pronounced by a man more than a man—He was Christ, the man-God. He said, 'Paz vobis, paz omnibus.'" Another man, whom you love, whom you all venerate, whom I love and venerate, has said, 'Kempez c'est la paix.' Now, what are we to understand by ——" The President: The Court retires to deliberate. Verger: That is it! Become reconciled with your enemies! The Court then ordered the Counsel to retire with you!—When the Judges returned this difficulty. You move before the examination commenced? The President informed him that he was at liberty to do so. The prisoner then began in a solemn and for some blade of grass, something living or variegated, on which to feast the sight. There is a yellow, bright, glittering horizon all around—a hot atmosphere baking the sand as it steams over its surface; the hoofs of the poor camels crack and split in all directions, and large flakes of skin hang like carpenters' chips from the gentleman's scorched nose; the lady—bless her pretty little face!—has got a dozen veils on and carries a parasol; yet, notwithstanding all these precautions, she is ready to sink from heat and fatigue. It is the finest season of the year, and the climate is considered cool and agreeable by the natives. Mid-day has passed, and we are jogging on with the same see-saw motion, very sleepy, and very hot. A locust has just thrown one of the party nearly into fits by such an unexpected apparition as anything living and moving in this expansive solitude. There is a little cloud of dust ahead! The first feelings entertained are alarm; these, however, gradually subside as the strangers draw nigh: they consist of a party of two men mounted each on a camel, and a third on foot with a huge club in his hands—some Arabs belonging to one of the wandering tribes, bound to civilised Egypt on a speculative journey. The long lance or spear, decorated with ostrich and other feathers, denotes the rank of the traveller; a gun and a brace of pistols complete his armament. The younger of the party is mounted on the camel that carries their small tent, or chadir, and the provisions, &c. If we may judge by the astonishment depicted in the countenance of the foot guide, such meetings with human beings in the desert are rare. This party have been so long a stranger to the track of man that the sudden appearance of the travellers caravan has quite dumfoundered them. Gradually they recover from their surprise; and, as the camels of both parties, according to invariable custom, stop and face each other when they meet, the travellers interchange questions and pipes, and then proceed on their different ways.

"GRIEF."—PAINTED BY SCHLESSENGER.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

THE NEW CHURCH OF ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST, ISLEWORTH, MIDDLESEX.

THIS handsome church was consecrated on the 7th of August last by the Bishop of Winchester (officiating for the late Bishop of London). The first stone of the edifice was laid by his Grace the Duke of Northumberland, K.G., on the 25th June, 1855, in the presence of a very large assemblage of the nobility and gentry of the locality. The noble Duke and Duchess kindly entertained the children of the parochial schools, after the ceremony, in the beautiful gardens of Syon.

The style of the church is Gothic, of the Perpendicular period. The plan consists of a nave and aisles, 56 feet in width and 76 feet in length, divided into five bays; a chancel, 38 feet in length and 21 feet wide, with aisle and vestry on the south side; a north porch, and a tower 22 feet square and 72 feet in height at the end of the north aisle.

NEW CHURCH OF ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST, ISLEWORTH.

There are 381 free and 263 appropriated sittings. The seats and the roof timbers are of deal, stained. The chancel is laid with Minton's encaustic tiles. The walls are of Kentish rag, with Bath-stone dressings. The architect was James Deason, Esq., of Keppel-street, Russell-square, his design having been selected from a variety of others. The contract (taken by Messrs. Dove, of Islington) was £4975. The sculptured font and the communion service were presented by the Rev. H. Glossop out of a fund contributed by the parishioners of Isleworth as a testimonial of respect for his services as Vicar for thirty-three years (1821 to 1854).

It was in the year 1846 that the first proposal to build a new church was made—the then Vicar and Curate (the Rev. H. Glossop and the Rev. C. J. Way) finding the parish church could not accommodate the existing population. Various delays, however, took place, and several different spots between Brentford End and Smallbury Green were suggested; but it was at length finally determined to fix upon the present very eligible site, which was generously offered to the Committee by the Duke of Northumberland.

The situation is within two or three hundred yards of the Isleworth station of the Windsor Railway; the edifice from it appears to great advantage. An ecclesiastical district has been attached to the new church; the incumbency is in the gift of the Vicar of Isleworth for the time being. It has been presented to the Rev. John Yarker by the present Vicar, the Rev. H. W. P. Richards.

To the left of the church in the engraving is the Parsonage House, completed within the last fortnight. It has been built in strict accordance with the character of the church, at the sole cost of John Farnell, Esq., of Isleworth. On the right of the view is shown a portion of a cluster of twelve almshouses, about to be erected and endowed by the same benevolent gentleman—forming altogether a very pleasing and picturesque group.

The immediate neighbourhood is replete with objects of interest. The newly-executed villas of the Woodlands are closely adjoining. Within a short distance is the populous village of Isleworth, celebrated for its salubrity, its productive fruit gardens, and the longevity of its inhabitants. Isleworth parish church, dedicated to All Saints, with its well-known "ivy-mantled tower," is a striking feature in the landscape; whilst Syon House, Kew Gardens, the progressing attractions of St. Margaret's (one of the most desirable spots on the banks of the Thames), and the classic neighbourhoods of Richmond and Twickenham, combine to render Isleworth and its vicinity one of the most delightful places of residence near the metropolis.

Amongst the subscribers to the new church we find his Grace the Duke of Northumberland, £3000; her Grace the Duchess Dowager of Northumberland, £500, the late Dowager Lady Cooper, of Isleworth House, £200; the Rev. H. Glossop, £100; the Rev. H. W. P. Richards, £100; the Rev. John Yarker, £100; John Farnell, Esq., £150; W. T. Farnell, Esq., £100; Richard Twining, Esq., £30, &c.

TESTIMONIAL TO CAPTAIN FITZGERALD, EX GOVERNOR OF WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

IN the days of Augustus it was a matter of congratulation that the arts and sciences, that pomp and luxury, had been introduced amongst the Britons, and the latter Roman Emperors lived to see the "barbarians" of our island, the most distant province of the empire, reciprocate and imitate the pomp and grandeur of Rome. We may presume that gorgeous plate was not presented to a Proconsul of an outlying province of that great empire, because the Roman people had a decided taste for architectural testimonials; but we recognise the same spirit in our colonists as in those of Rome, when we find the ultima thule of Great Britain presenting such a testimonial as we engrave to a Governor retiring from his office. The only difference appears to be in this, that communication being a thousand times more practicable, our British distant province comes to London, and purchases its votive offering from Messrs. Hunt and Roskell, of New Bond-street, instead of erecting a monument of marble or stone in the colony.

The inscription upon the base of the subjoined candelabrum will tell everything which its pictorial representative has left unsaid:—

PRESENTED TO CHARLES FITZGERALD, Esq., R.N., by a portion of the Colonists of Western Australia, as a tribute of their esteem and respect, and in grateful acknowledgment of his zealous and upright exertions in promoting the interests of the Colony during a period of seven years' administration of the Government.—August 18th, 1856.

GRIEF.

THERE'S good in tears, or they had not been sent
By Him who is all good! It is not wise
To keep our sorrows in our hearts up-pent
When we can give them freedom from our eyes.

The storm-cloud only darkens the fair earth
Until it falleth down in gentle rain;
And then what wond'rous beauties have their birth!
So, when the heart is overcharged with pain,

We see a shadow upon every good;
But let our heavy sorrows have their way,
And as they well into a tearful flood
What comfort may not come? Ah! who can say?

Grief hath a mission holier than joy—
It moves the selfish, and it warms the cold;
A common sorrow will e'en pride destroy,
And change the King and beggar to one mould.

Our griefs should make us gentler to our kind,
And, as we comfort need, more comfort pay:
So sung sorrow, as our tears shall find
Have washed some grossness of our soul away. M. L.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1857.

A STRONG man, able and willing to work, but starving for want of some one able and willing to employ him, has been declared by a great philosopher, and had been previously declared by a great poet, to be the saddest spectacle under heaven. If so, what form of phraseology can express the mournfulness of the spectacle afforded by five-and-thirty thousand men in the same deplorable condition? Yet it would appear, if we may believe the statement made at the great public meeting of the unemployed, which was peaceably held in Smithfield on Monday last, that London at this moment, amid its huge masses of wealth, contains this prodigious number of artisans, more or less skilled in handicraft, who seek in vain for the opportunity of gaining their daily bread by their honest labour. We see no reason to doubt the statement, though we must accept the numbers as a fair approximation to accuracy rather than the actual and bare truth. The whole of these unfortunate labourers are connected, more or less intimately, with the building trades of the metropolis, and include 9000 carpenters, 4000 plasterers, 4000 painters, 1000 stonemasons, 2000 smiths, moulders, and decorators, and 15,000 bricklayers or operative builders. The causes of this unparalleled distress are not difficult to discover. The growth of London within the past ten or a dozen years has been enormously rapid. Tyburnia alone has within that period received an extension which has converted an insignificant and straggling suburb into a city of palaces. If it stood by itself in any part of Europe or America, it would rank in magnificence, opulence, and population with the capitals of many a sovereign State, and would receive the praises of admiring tourists for its beauty, its extent, and its regularity. Belgravia, Camdenia, and scores of other suburbs of inferior note—north, south, east, and west—have been covered with streets, terraces, crescents, and squares, until visitors, lost in wondering perplexity, have puzzled themselves to know "where all the people could come from" to inhabit such a vastitude of brick-and-mortar. But if the builders did not overbuild, other causes came into operation, and, more notably than any other, the Russian war, and the consequent increase of the Property and Income Tax from sevenpence to sixtenpence in the pound. Men who built with borrowed capital found it impossible to continue their operations in such a state of monetary affairs. A five per cent return on a capital only to be borrowed at six or seven per cent was obvious ruin. The speculative builders of the metropolis were among the first to make the discovery. The result is the state of things so feelingly described at the Smithfield meetings. And where is the remedy? Harsh political economists will perhaps tell the unhappy thirty-five thousand who are out of work that they ought "to have made hay while the sun shone," and saved in the day of their prosperity sufficient to keep them in the day of their adversity; or at least enough to enable them to hold on until their business should take a fresh start. But political economy has no bowels, and its arguments, however theoretically sound, are practically as useless as they are unfeeling. Vagrancy and the Poor-rates will of necessity be the resources to which many of these men will be compelled to fly; for we will not do them the injustice to suppose that they will swell the ranks of the professedly criminal population and betake themselves to robbery as a means of subsistence. Their orderly and peaceable conduct—although many of them did, and do, talk nonsense—ought to be sufficient to rescue them from such a supposition, and to enlist in their behalf the warm sympathy of all classes. In no other country in Europe could such a body of men meet together to discuss so painfully personal and irritating a subject without a popular convulsion, if not a revolution. In Paris the all-powerful Emperor has been deterred from carrying out a great project of social and sanitary reform—the introduction of water to the houses on the London system—from apprehension of the evil consequences which might accrue if the thirty or forty thousand Auvergnats, who gain their subsistence by their water-carts, were thrown idle upon the streets. Those who may feel inclined to be alarmed or angry with the Communism and Socialism spoken by the working men of London should remember these things, and make allowances for the poor fellows, who speak not only from the fulness of the heart, but from the emptiness of the belly; and be convinced that their discontent, their Socialism, and their treason—if they have spoken any—will disappear as soon as they can obtain the work which they so earnestly desire. In the hope of better days, many of them will stay at home; but the stronger, younger, and more adventurous of the number will draught themselves away to new regions—to the United States, to Canada, and to Australia, which will severally receive them with open arms. It is not the business of the Government to find work for the people; but, in a case like this, it should consider whether it cannot with advantage afford to English labourers and good subjects the same facilities for reaching the British Colonies, and settling there, as it afforded to the foreign legionaries who were drilled at Shorncliffe, but never fired a gun in defence of this country. Such a remedy would be practicable as well as benevolent; and what, in such a case, is better still—it would ultimately be remunerative.

Now that the nation is actually engaged in hostilities with China, and that negotiations must of necessity take place to restore peace, it is to be hoped that advantage will be taken of the opportunity to remove all existing subjects of dispute and ill feeling, and to clear up misunderstandings. We say nothing in this place of the lorcha which was the unfortunate cause of the present quarrel. We only allude to it, to express the hope that the Government will not confine itself to so small a matter, but that it will endeavour, by fair and not unfriendly negotiation, to render the future relations of the two countries as agreeable as they have hitherto been advantageous. But if unfortunate British subjects are to be captured in time of peace, and sold into slavery, by the Chinese, it is evident that peace is not well founded, and that it is liable at any moment to be rudely interrupted. The natives of Formosa, an island under the jurisdiction of the Chinese Government, have, it appears, the barbarous and inhospitable practice of making slaves of the hapless mariners whose vessels are wrecked on their coasts. Two cases of the kind have recently been made public, and authenticated with the names of the shipowners, and of the relatives of the unhappy men who have suffered this wrong at the hands of the treacherous Formosans. To bring the Chinese Government to a reckoning for inhumanity such as this, and to prevent it for the future, would be a quarrel infinitely more creditable and noble than that in which we have become involved in the matter of the Arrow lorcha, or in that of any poisonous opium which it is the interest of the English to sell, and the pleasure of the Chinese to buy. China has too long been permitted to withdraw herself from the duties of civilisation, and she must either be made to conform to the world's law, or suffer the penalties which fall both upon barbarians and semi-barbarians, who either ignore the humanities of life, or wilfully set them at defiance. Every nation that owns a ship suffers, and has long suffered, from the insolence of the Chinese; and, though this country is but too well able to settle unaided all the differences that have arisen, or may yet arise, between British and Chinese officials, at Canton or elsewhere, we are glad to see that something like a general league of Christendom against Chinese presumption, exclusiveness, and rapacity is likely to be formed. The United States and France have been fellow-sufferers with this country. If, by their joint action, China can be induced without further bloodshed to join the great commonwealth of nations, and conform to its laws, the world will be the gainer, and China itself the greatest gainer of all. There never was a better opportunity than the present for trying the question, and we shall look forward with the highest interest for the ulterior steps taken by our Government to hasten so happy a consummation.

THE COURT.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, and the other distinguished visitors invited to be present at the dramatic entertainment at Windsor Castle on Thursday evening, took their departure for London on Saturday; and, were succeeded by the Portuguese Minister and the Countess Lavradio, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis of Abercorn, and Lady Katherine Hamilton, the Earl of Shelburne, the Rev. Dr. Philpott, Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, and Rear Admiral W. A. B. Hamilton.

On Sunday the Queen and Prince, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, Princess Alice, and Princess Helena, attended Divine service in the private chapel. The visitors staying in the Castle were also at the service. The Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor read the prayers, and the Rev. Dr. Philpott preached the sermon. The Count of Flanders went to the Catholic chapel at Claremont.

On Monday the Queen and Princess Louise walked in the grounds adjoining the Castle. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Count of Flanders and Prince Edward of Leiningen, went out shooting. The Marquis of Abercorn, Rear Admiral W. A. B. Hamilton, and Lord Burghersh, had the honour to accompany the Prince. The Prince of Wales went out hunting. In the evening her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Leiningen, and her Serene Highness Princess Amelie of Hohenlohe-Schillingfürst dined with her Majesty.

On Tuesday the Queen and the Princess Royal walked in the grounds of the Castle. His Royal Highness Prince Albert went out hunting. The Right Hon. Sir Charles Wood had the honour to accompany his Royal Highness. The Prince of Wales rode out on horseback. His Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar arrived on a visit.

On Wednesday the Queen and the Prince of Wales walked in the Home Park. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Count of Flanders, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, went out shooting. The younger Royal children took a carriage drive.

On Thursday the Queen and the Prince walked together in the Castle grounds.

On Saturday (this day) her Majesty will hold an investiture of the Order of the Bath at Windsor Castle.

His Serene Highness Prince Edward of Leiningen left Frogmore, the residence of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, on Wednesday, for Germany.

The Countess de Persigny and her infant daughter are still progressing very favourably. Her Majesty the Queen sent on Monday to make inquiries after the health of the Countess.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston arrived in town on Monday, from Broadlands. His Lordship has quite recovered from his attack of gout.

Viscount Combermere is prevented, by an attack of influenza, from attending the Investiture of the Bath to be held at Windsor today. His Lordship will arrive in London next week, to be present at the Earl of Derby's dinner preparatory to the opening of the Parliamentary Session.

The Right Hon. B. Disraeli and Mrs. Disraeli have arrived at Grosvenor Gate, from Paris.

ORIGINAL LETTERS OF CLIVE DISCOVERED.—Our readers will learn with pleasure that the original letters written by Clive, after the battle of Plassey, to the Madras Government, and which were certainly not consulted by Mill or any other historian of India, have at last been brought to light by the indefatigable keeper of the Record-office at the India House. Clive's letter of the 2nd of July to the Madras authorities, now found, differs somewhat from that of the 28th July to the Secret Committee, quoted in Malcolm's "Life of Clive."—Smith, Elder, and Co.'s Illustrated Mail.

THE PHOTOGRAPHIC EXHIBITION.

There are two or three frames of "Crimean Heroes," photographed for her Majesty, by Mr. Cundall, which are very praiseworthy. It is no easy matter to group three or four men together, and take them of so large a size, and preserve "the focus" well throughout. The attitudes of the men are excellent; and we do not know that we have ever seen a much finer portrait than that of Sergeant-Major Edwards, of the Scotch Fusiliers, the man who presided at the banquet to the Guards. Mr. Cundall's views of Wells Cathedral and Glastonbury Abbey afford further evidence that he is a good photographer.

We must not pass by Mr. Henry Taylor's productions without a word of praise. This gentleman delights in nature, has a good eye for the picturesque, and is always careful and painstaking in country cottages and his studies of hedgerows are admirable.

Major Pierrez has succeeded in making a series of reduced copies of Hogarth's "Harlot's Progress," which evince great care and a good knowledge of photography. We see that they are copied from proof impressions of Hogarth's great work.

The copies of last year's Academy pictures by Mr R. Howlett are as excellent in their way as Mr. Thurston Thompson's Raphaels O Neill's "Market-day," Lee and Cooper's cattle piece, Fued's "Home and the Homeless," and several other well-known pictures, are reproduced in all faithfulness—excepting when the white and yellow colours of the painting interfere. His large studies of heads are very fine, but we certainly think that they are eclipsed by others in the room. Nor can we say much for his landscapes or views of buildings. We see that he and Mr. Harrall have both taken very indifferent "Views of the Baptistry at Canterbury Cathedral," which was so extremely well done by Mr. Bedford a year ago. Surely there ought to be a delicacy among photographers which should prevent them from taking a particular view selected by another.

Of Mr. Reflander's many contributions it is difficult to speak favourably. They are mostly attempts to make up pictures of the genre school; and they are mostly failures. We cannot say that they are utter failures. He chooses his subjects chiefly from vulgar life; and all we can say of them is, they are faithfully represented. We must except, however, the heads of the two children posed after the little angels in Raphael's "Madonna di San Sisto," which are good. His landscape, which is printed from several negatives, is pretty, but must not be commended, as it is false to nature.

The portraits this year are certainly better than before. The series of eminent men issued by Messrs. Mayall and Polyblank are well known. They are pure photographs, not "touched" as many are, and are, therefore, the more valuable; the heads of Professor Owen and Bell are excellent so, also, is that of Mr. Warren De la Rue.

Mr. Herbert Watkins sends a series of large heads which are also "pure" and very good; we do not know when we have seen a head we have more admired than his portrait of "Ernest Reed" (8). Surely such works as these ought to be preferred to those "made-up" pictures in which one scarcely knows how little of photography is left: to our minds these last are namby-pamby prettinesses, the former vigorous and truthful works of art.

Mr. Bingham's "Horace Vernet" (92) is another splendid illustration of our meaning: what "touching" could improve that picture? We miss Mr. Kilburn this year as an exhibitor.

Among the highly-finished coloured portraits Mr. Lock's are preeminent: there is a charm in his paintings which we look for in vain in the works of others. Mr. Williams' vignette portraits, however, are delicious. His fair-haired young ladies and beautiful children seem almost to belong to the fairy world. The same gentleman's stereoscopic views of "Our Village" are the most charming little productions of the sort. Mr. Williams must possess a cultivated taste, or he would never have selected such a series of capital bits.

The celebrated sea and cloud view, by Le Gray, about which the world has run mad, is exhibited—almost the only picture from France. It is certainly very fine, and can only be attributed to a combination of lucky accidents.

Dr. Percy exhibits several fine picture scenes from Devonshire We cannot tell why he should print them such a wretched colour. There are several nice little subjects sent by Mr. Knight. We must not forget to mention some fine pictures of Tintern and Melrose Abbeys, by Mr Mellwish.

In conclusion, we beg earnestly to advise photographers not to show their pictures in public till the time of their exhibition. Nearly two-thirds of the present collection have been shown before the public auction. Let us draw the attention of the council to this matter The interests of the society imperatively demand a new regulation.

IMPROVEMENTS IN PHOTOGRAPHY.—The substitution by Mr. Mayall of paper for the metallic plate used in the old Daguerreotype, while it avoided the unpleasant glare inevitable during the early stages of the art, was attended by this disadvantage, that what was gained in purity and delicacy was lost in delicacy. Paper, from its fibrous nature, absorbs the middle tints; and hence, in the case of coloured works, the artist was forced by stippling to supply the defects of the photographer The chemical properties of ivory render that substance inapplicable to the purposes of the art, but Mr Mayall, by a compound of sulphate of baryta and albumen, has obtained a material that has the appearance and close texture of ivory, without any of the resisting qualities. The middle tints of the "negative" are thus accurately reproduced, and by a simple wash of colour the artist executes a work equal in finish to the old ivory miniatures, endowed with all the truthfulness proper to photography. The method of producing the figure and the background from separate "negatives" receives new development from this invention, as the nuances of distance become more capable of exact imitation.

At the death of Mr. Thomas Henry Hall, who was, for many years, Chairman of the Improvement Committee of the City of London, the Court of Common Council voted a sum of money to be expended upon a memorial to be placed in Guildhall. The work was offered for competition, with a prize of 250 guineas. We are glad to learn that the successful competitor is Mr. Joseph Durham, so well known for his popular bust of Jenny Lind and his recent beautiful bust of her Majesty the Queen

THE AMERICAN LEGATION.—Mr. Benjamin Moran has been appointed by President Pierce Assistant Secretary of the American Legation at London The office of Assistant Secretary is newly created, and as, we have understood, is the result of a special application from Mr. Buchanan back to the immediate predecessor of the Minister and the Secretary of Legation in charge, was excused on account of the press of public business. Mr Moran was private secretary to Mr Dallas when that gentleman was American Minister to the Court, at the last of Mr Buchanan's stay Mr Moran was Secretary of Legation pro tempore, and for the last eight months he has been recognised in the United States at London

THE PRINCIPALITIES.—Instructions for the evacuation of the Principalities by the Austrian troops were sent off from Vienna on Thursday to Bucharest and Jassy. The homeward march is to begin in the month of March next.

NEW CORONER FOR THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER.—M. T. Baines, Esq., Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, has appointed W. J. Payne, Esq., Deputy Coroner for the city of London, to be Coroner for the Duchy of Lancaster, in the room of the late unfortunate Mr. Thomas Higgs, who committed suicide a few days ago.

FIRE AT THE BANK OF IRELAND.—An alarming fire broke out last Monday morning, about four o'clock, in the Bank of Ireland—once the Irish Parliament-house—and since its erection esteemed the finest public building in Dublin For some time its total destruction was appre hended, but, owing to the prompt arrival of engines and assistance, the flames were soon subdued. The fire originated in the book-keeper's office, the roof of which has been considerably damaged.

ALARMING ACCIDENT AT THE MANCHESTER CATHEDRAL.—During the celebration of Divine service at the cathedral, last Sunday afternoon, the occupants of the pews in the westerly portion of the north gallery were startled by hearing a slight crack overhead, and almost immediately afterwards the whole of the ornamental plaster moulding, which covered the entire of the panelling, gave way, and fell with a loud crash. Great was the alarm, especially among the ladies occupying seats in this part of the church; most of them brought out the north gallery left them on the instant, some gentlemen even climbing over the tops of the pews in their haste to escape. The preacher, thus suddenly arrested in his discourse, remained silent, looking with some anxiety towards that part of the gallery where the crash occurred; but this state of suspense was terminated by the Rev. Canon Wray rising in the reading-desk, and quietly pronouncing the benediction instead at the close of the service, which was thus brought to a sudden termination. The alarm had, however, to some extent, by this time subsided, and many of the congregation remained to see and inquire for themselves as to the nature of the accident.

STRANDING OF THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM-SHIP, "THE TYNE."

A SHORT account of the stranding of this fine ship was given in our columns on Saturday last. From all the information we can gather, the conduct of the Captain, Mr. Vallery was most praiseworthy. He was in bed at the time she struck, had kept the lead going every two hours, and, as it was very hazy and a thick fog, had just made up his mind to stop the engines until daybreak, when she struck heavily.

As most of the papers have stated, this part of the coast is most dangerous; but, happily, for the crew and passengers, the steamer came in in one of the least dangerous spots for miles east or west. The vessel lies upon one of the ledges that run out from the Kimmeridge clay-head to the Swanage Bay. The beds forming these ledges are visible in the cliffs of this formation, and rise from the shore at a considerable angle, cropping out at the surface of the cliffs to the west: and as a natural consequence, when they dip below the beach, they stand away S.S.E., and, very gradually sinking, are visible for a long way out. The softer clay between these hard layers is washed away by the action of the sea, and, as the ledges are constantly undermined, they break up, and thus a series of ledges, like the ribs of a house, rise up at an angle correspondent with those seen in the cliffs. The ship came in between two of these till she struck. A very heavy ground sea, as is often the case after a strong wind to the west, was rolling in, and each sea, as it struck the side and stern of the vessel, forced her gradually further in. Shortly after she struck, getting a little more east, into deeper water, she swung round, and very happily for those on board came head to wind, by which the force of the waves was separated as it were by the bows of the ship. Her lights and signals having been seen, some of the boats of the coast-guard from Kimmeridge, St. Alban's, and Bottom put off, and they, knowing the coast and its dangers, advised the captain to keep every person on board till the daylight as it would be next to an impossibility to land as the sea then ran. This advice was followed, and all in the ship were saved. One unfortunate coast-guard man was unhappily drowned in his attempt to save others.

We have spoken of the distance to which these ledges run out: the Kimmeridge formation extends along the coast for about five miles, and is some hundreds of feet in thickness; to the eastward it dips under the Portland beds, and these beds extend along the coast from St. Alban's Head to Durlestone Head, near Swanage. Most of our readers have heard of Portland Race and its dangers. At St. Alban's Head one of the ledges of the under-lying Kimmeridge runs out for miles S.S.E.; and, in coming down Channel, a vessel may keep sounding on the east of the ledge, and find at every cast of the lead less and less depth till, on reaching the crest of this ledge, the line drops directly fathoms deep. It is this ledge that, as the tide makes up from the west, causes the St. Alban's Race, which then runs with great swiftness for miles out from the coast on the ebb-tide the current sets in for the coast, and it is more than probable this might have been the case when the Tyne struck, and thus have been a principal cause of the accident.

If this ship had gone half a mile east or west, she could not but have become a complete wreck. The cliffs of the Portland formation eastward rise perpendicularly from one to three hundred feet, and their base is strewn with immense rocks in all direction, and where not so strewn are perpendicular to a great depth below the surface. It was about the year 1780 that two miles east, in Seacombe Bay, the Halsewell, East Indiaman, was lost, and Captain Pearce and his daughters, with other passengers, and most of the crew were drowned. To the west the coast is equally dangerous. It is proposed, if the weather continues favourable, to try to get her off on Monday next, when there will be a spring tide, but if the weather should set in from any point between S.E. and S.W. by W., the chances are that she will scarcely bear up against the heavy seas that will then assail her.

Dr. Acland, of Oxford, one of the passengers on board the Tyne, in a letter to the Oxford Herald, makes some useful remarks on the late disaster. After saying that the public have themselves greatly to blame for many of the shipwrecks which take place, he proceeds thus:—

"As much stress is now laid on expedition in all steam transit by sea or land, that, practically, hours are often more valued than lives. Speed is attended by increased risks, and by increased expenditure of various kinds. It is the public choose to go, the more lives will from time to time be lost; and though we may, when accidents occur, throw back the responsibility on the professional men who have been thus goaded on, still our own patience of delay is at the bottom of the mischief in a great number of the cases. The old habits of seamanship, keeping well off lee shores, hauling to in fogs, waiting for pilots, and so forth, may be too antiquated for the days of steam and the age of hurry; but as long as winds, fogs, currents, and reefs, and the ordinary physical and moral infirmities of men exist, these old habits, if slow, will still be at least safe.

"The papers tell us that this great packet company has lost nine fine ships: and I read of the total wreck, during my absence, of the Ostend packet, under an old and valued commander, when it was blowing a gale and wind right. If we knew the hearts of these and scores of other captains, how many would inform us that their character was at stake

[illegible] The fact is that the public generally knows what they want of their captains, and must therefore make it, by knowing they are not thinking about it. Each person has a wait: this wait is to be supplied and the whole system becomes one of unhealthy excitement—high pressure, doubled by competition, and little noticed when successful, besides lumber.

"Whether these remarks apply to the present instance others must decide; but, as a working man myself, I feel a resentment if a system urges on its agents and then turns on them for the consequences. Employers should ever bear in mind that good professional men, especially if sailors or soldiers, value, as a matter of course, duty first and their own life second. With what circumspection, therefore, is the standard of duty to be imposed!

"I declare I pity [illegible] from what I saw on Tuesday of the officers of the Tyne that they value their lives as nothing to their duty to the company and the public.

"In this I add to the more pleasant task of considering how much worse everything might have been on Tuesday than it was

"1. Be ship, instead of coming round head to sea might have stopped [illegible] on, in which case I presume every soul would have been washed off her.

"2. The passengers, instead of being confiding, patient, and cheerful in the many hours they had to feel the crushing of the ship before help could come, might have been troublesome to the crew, themselves, and each other.

"3. The officers crew, and servants, instead of being affable, self-possessed, communicative, and like brave men who knew their risk, and met it, might have made our situation much more hard to bear, whereas Captain Vallery, as a man of sound judgment, encouraged us by procuring our usual food, in going where we would in the ship, and in possessing ourselves of such information as we chose; so that, with scarcely an exception, everything was calm, reasonable, and convenient as the case admitted.

"4. No words can express the manly conduct of the two Tatchells, who first after high water came off after the heavy surf permitted it, or before it was even prudent, with a letter from Mr. Jackson to the ship, offering help to myself by name, and to any other passengers who could come in the splendid little surf-boat, which had been sent for by a cart from Harbour Cove on purpose. These two men, having been all but swamped in conveying myself, Mr. Mathews, an engineer from the Brazils, and two others (losing one oar in the first breaker, and regaining it only after happily three seas passed under us without breaking), yet went off again for other persons during the next six hours, I think, six times.

"Both, the highly intelligent clear-headed seaman who was chief boatman at the Bill Bottom, Mitchell, from St. Alban's Head, and Brown, from Kimmeridge, with their respective crews, have been spoken of, I think, in the London papers; their conduct cannot be too much praised. Had Bath not come off instantly after he saw our rockets, and had we, in our ignorance of the coast and local ground sea, taken to the boats in the surf, it is impossible to conjecture how few would have reached the shore It was his local knowledge alone that explained to us that we must wait several hours till the half ebb, when the sea would probably moderate without this, probably, all would have perished urgently to leave the ship when it was found she could not be moved, and many lives might have been lost.

"And, lastly, I shall never forget the wise courtesy of the Lady Augusta and Lady Catherine Scott and their family (before Mr. Farrer's and Mr. Jackson's return), in inciting the passengers, guided by Mr. Tilbury, to make every arrangement that was possible for the convenience whatever was requisite to and from the respective localities provided for the ladies and children, the passengers, and crew. If that courtesy and thoughtfulness—carried on as it energetically was by Mr. Farrer and Mr. Jackson on their arrival could be described, it would serve as a model for all similar occasions. I venture to say, this because, being the last man and the last but one, and not having finally left the shore till the last men and the saved valuables had arrived, I witnessed all; whereas those of my fellow-passengers who did not come till all was prepared for them can hardly conceive the unceasing readiness, energy, and good humour of the people, even to those who carried the preventive boat that was stove in to the top of the cliff, out of harm's way.

"It may help to convey to some of your readers the feelings which such scenes as this may impress on a man, if I say that, as the last act of the evening when more than 200 had been fed and cared for, the thanksgiving prayers of the Service to be used at Sea were read in the stable by Mr Farrer to the exhausted men as they lay or stood on the clean straw, and that I never wish to hear ring in my ears a happier and more cheering sound than of the manly "Amens" which closed this day—a day when, after the first event, everything might have been worse, and hardly anything could have been any better.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Oxford, Jan. 15. HENRY W. ACLAND.

WRECK OF THE AMERICAN SHIP "KILBY" ON THE GOODWIN SANDS.—A few days since the American ship Kilby was seen during a fresh gale and hazy weather upon the inner face of the north sand head of the Goodwin. The harbour-master of Ramsgate immediately dispatched to the scene of danger the commissioners' steamer with the Northumberland life-boat in tow. They soon approached the ship, and perseveringly remained by her. The masts were, however, cut away, the ship filling fast and rapidly breaking up. The captain and his wife, the steward and his wife, the whole of the crew, and fifteen other persons were then taken off by the Ramsgate life-boat, which soon transhipped them to the steamer, in which every available comfort was administered to them. They were all afterwards safely landed at Ramsgate. Thus this valuable life-boat has again been instrumental in rescuing, probably, forty lives from an inevitable death on the fatal Goodwin Sands.

The French Marines now stationed at the Piræus have got up a theatre there, as their comrades the Zouaves did before Sebastopol.

THE GREAT BLASTING OPERATION AT HOLYHEAD HARBOUR, NORTH WALES.

THIS great national undertaking, which is being carried out, under the immediate direction of the Board of Admiralty, by the Messrs. J. and C. Rigby, of Westminster, and which was designed by the late Mr. Rendel, affords periodically to the civil and military engineer an opportunity of witnessing the effect of large quantities of gunpowder brought to bear on the dislodgement of immense masses of the hardest description of quartz rock, amounting, in several instances, to upwards of 100,000 tons. One of these stupendous operations, the magnitude of which is shown in the plan and elevation of the accompanying illustration, took place, on Friday, the 16th instant, in the presence of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart., one of the Lords of the Admiralty; the Earl of Airlie, Lieut.-Colonel Servante of the Royal Engineers, the Hon. W. O Stanley, M.P., Sir Richard Balkeley, Bart., Lord Clarence Paget, Chancellor Trevor, Captain Balkeley, Captain Skinner, R.N., Professor Ramsay, Mr. Hayter, Mr. Dobson, besides several other engineers and scientific gentlemen, as well as a very large party of ladies—amongst whom we observed Lady Willoughby de Broke, the Hon. Mrs. Stanley, Mrs. Trevor Griffiths, Mrs. Charles Rigby, Mrs. Trevor, Mrs. Hayter; and several hundred spectators

The operation and engineering arrangements were under the personal direction of Mr. Charles Rigby, assisted by Mr. Rentheimer, the resident engineer of the firm.

All present were much gratified and astonished by the effects produced with such certainty by the powerful agency of gunpowder and the vultaic battery, the large amount of stone dislodged and broken up into masses varying from three to ten tons each. It is computed that above 120,000 tons were brought down and broken into masses ready for loading by this explosion. The aggregate charge in the four chambers acting upon a face of 210 feet in length, 115 feet in height, with a line of least resistance of about 25 feet, was 16,000 lb. of gunpowder. The voltaic battery was placed a short distance from the quarries, and the spectators were within a protected battery or observatory in front of the mountain, at a distance of only 600 yards, from which they were enabled to witness the explosion without danger, not a stone having been propelled 100 yards from the face of the quarry We may here mention that nearly 1,000,000 tons of stone have been already dislodged by this means for the construction of the harbour, without failure and without accident. In the mining operations which take place for this purpose the quantity of gunpowder used annually exceeds 500,000 lb., or more than 1000 tons; and the stone deposited in the sea, for the formation of the rubble foundations and embankment, exceeds nearly 1,000,000 tons. In addition to the agency which gunpowder affords for the rapid construction of this breakwater, there are employed upwards of 1200 men, a large number of locomotive engines, stationary engines, travelling cranes with steam power, and every modern appliance which mechanical skill can bring to bear to accelerate the completion of this important harbour of refuge.

Key of Heading 33 feet. Depth of Sink, 83 feet. Length of Left Gallery, 85 feet. Length of Right Gallery 85 feet.
Charges of Powder No. 1 Chamber, 4200. No. 2 do. 4200. No. 3, 2800. No. 4, 4000 lb. Total charge 16,000 lb.
Height of Face 115 feet. Length of Face 210 feet. Line of least resistance, average 25 feet.
Number of Charges in each Chamber, 1000 lb. each. Number of Chambers, 16.
Scale of Plan [illegible] Inch

An interesting incident occurred during the operation. Immediately before the charge of powder was fired, a goat was seen upon the verge of the mountain; and, in an instant, the timid animal descended amidst the dislodged masses of the rock, and came to the ground unhurt!

To show its increasing utility, it may be mentioned that in 1854 1788 vessels, with a tonnage of 137,169 tons, anchored under shelter of the Northern Breakwater; and this number has been increased to upwards of 2000 vessels during the last year, or considerably above double the number of this harbour.

The system adopted of constructing this breakwater so as to combine the advantages of obtaining stone from the adjoining mountain, with economy and rapidity of execution, has been that of forming lumber ranges, with railways over the line of the breakwater, about eighty feet above the bottom of the sea, and depositing the masses of stone of all dimensions by dropping them vertically from iron railway waggons, in trains of from ten to twelve at a time, into the required positions, thus bringing up the mass simultaneously to above the level of the sea. In this manner as much as 25,000 to 30,000 tons have been deposited in one week, and this vast demand is supplied by the great blasting operations that take place in the quarries from time to time, and of which the one we have described as witnessed on Friday, the 16th instant, produced upwards of 100,000 tons at one explosion. Although the severe storms which have repeatedly occurred on this expo-coast have done from time to time much injury to portions of the stages, not a stone has been displaced from the superstructure now in course of construction upon the Rubble embankment, thus showing the judgment and skill evinced by the late Mr. Rendel in the adoption of this system of engineering as applied to the rapid and successful formation of harbours of refuge. The Eastern Breakwater (forming the inner area) and Packet Pier will be shortly commenced, with which the Chester and Holyhead Railway will be connected, so that passengers can without delay embark under cover on board the packets from the Harbour Railway Station, avoiding thereby any interruption to the traffic in the transfer from the packets to the trains, and saving thereby nearly an hour of time. This pier will also admit of being used as a store for at least 2000 tons of coals for the use of the packets or other vessels that may avail themselves of the harbour.

The works were commenced in 1845, and have ever since that time been unceasingly carried forward. When completed, this harbour will stand unrivalled as one of the most stupendous achievements of the present age as regards the boldness of construction and rapidity of execution, and will form one of the finest and largest artificial harbours in the world. It would also, in the event of war, afford for the trade, commerce, and shipping of Liverpool one of the surest means of protection; being capable of harbouring in safety vessels of war of the largest class, and in any numbers which might be found necessary or desirable for the purpose.

ARICA, IN PERU, ATTACKED BY THE SQUADRON OF GENERAL VIRANCO.

THE MOVEMENT IN PERU.

REVOLUTIONS are so frequent in this country that scarcely two years pass over in quiet. About six weeks ago Ariquipa, the chief city of the south, and second in Peru, pronounced for General Vivanco; and, on the 16th Nov., whilst the Peruvian 44-gun steam-frigate Apurimac was lying at Arica, Lieutenant Montero, taking advantage of Commodore Salsedo and his principal officers being on shore at a ball, hauled down the broad pendant, declared for General Vivanco, and steamed away for Islay, the port of Ariquipa, under a salute of 21 guns, leaving the unfortunate Commodore to enjoy his vales à deux temps at his leisure. On her arrival at Islay, she captured the screw-steamer Loa, with 60,000 dollars on board, which had been placed there for safety, and, on the town pronouncing, received troops from Ariquipa, and sailed with the Loa to attack Arica. They reached the latter port on the 26th, and the frigate immediately summoned the town to surrender, which being refused, she went to work landing troops. At first they received a check, and were beat back, but, on the Loa's anchoring off the mole head, more troops, under the protection of her grape-shot and the boats' guns, were landed, and, after some sharp fighting, the Government troops were either killed or taken prisoners, and the town remained in possession of Vivanco's party. Some 20 to 25 were killed, and from 20 to 40 wounded. Considering the Government troops only numbered from 60 to 80, they fought well, but they suffered severely. Fortunately for the foreign residents her Majesty's ship Tribune, Captain Edgell, had called in on the 24th, and, learning the state of affairs, was proceeding to Islay when she fell in with the squadron, and steamed back in company. Her presence contributed in a great degree to the preservation of order after the town had fallen, whilst her medical staff were of great assistance to the wounded on both sides. Finding the town did not pronounce, the Peruvian frigate re-embarked her men.

At daylight, on the 27th, large bodies of troops were observed coming from Tama, the chief town of the department, and, as there was every appearance of a desperate struggle taking place, the ladies and foreigners were offered an asylum on board the British frigate which many accepted. After a long discussion the Peruvian Commandant agreed not to fire on the town if the troops did not advance, and he was allowed to take off coal and provisions. Owing to the exertions of Mr. Nugent, her Britannic Majesty's Consul, these terms were accepted, and much bloodshed was avoided. At night the troops marched in, and at noon next day the squadron sailed for Islay, to the great relief of the inhabitants. A French lady was struck in the face by a spent shot, and some fears were at first entertained of her life, but she recovered.

ISLAY, IN PERU, THE HEAD-QUARTERS OF GENERAL VIRANCO.

The Tribune followed the squadron to Islay, and found another screw-steamer had joined them. She arrived in the nick of time, for the Pacific mail-steamer Bogota, was in difficulties. Some troops had been sent down from Lima, but on arrival had pronounced for Vivanco, amidst cheers from the ships. They, of course, wished to land, to which, as passengers, there was no objection; but Vivanco's party wanted to take the Colonel prisoner, which, of course, could not be allowed; and on this gentle hint being forwarded to head-quarters they at once gave up the point, though Vivanco declared he had been removed in the same way at Callao. Vivanco has all the steamers except a small gunboat. So matters are at present. Lima, Montero sports a broad pendant: this is certainly the country for promotion!

General Vivanco is a mild, gentlemanly-looking man of the middle height; though much younger, he is not unlike, particularly about the forehead, the gallant Lord of the Isles. He is popular, and much beloved by the soldiers, but seems too mild for the set he has to deal with. The Tribune's appearance at Islay caused a great sensation. Cavalry dashed about, troops hurried off to the ships, the fires were stirred up—for the President had proclaimed them pirates.

ARICA

Is the sea-port of Tacna, from which it is distant thirty-six miles. A railway connects the two towns, and nearly all the merchandise for Bolivia passes by this route. The town is very poor, having but few trees or signs of vegetation. The valley, distant two miles, which produces orange, lemon, and fig trees, is the only redeeming point, for there an occasional patch of green is seen amidst very brown dust-coloured foliage. The valley, a mile to two in width, is formed by the heavy rush of water occasioned by the melting of the snows in the Cordilleras, which lasts for two months in the year; during the remaining months it is a dry watercourse, the surrounding country being a deep arid sand. The anchorage is good.

ISLAY.

This is a more wretched place still, although the sea-port of the second city of Peru. No sign of vegetation exists nought but a dry, arid sand, covered here and there by white patches of light dust, said to be ashes thrown from the volcano of Arequipa. The water is deep close to the shore; and, as a swell tumbles in along the whole line of the Pacific coast, lying at anchor is not always so pleasant. Although Peru is rich in mines of every description, the appearance of the country is anything but pleasing. There is no luxuriant vegetation as in other countries of the same latitude, but a dry, parched soil. Yet Providence protects it from the sun's scorching rays, by spreading as it were a veil of fleecy clouds between the sun and the earth, and refreshing the latter at night with heavy dews. Thus is to this Peru owes its delicious climate: and where on the other side in this latitude—12 south—you would be borne down by heat, we enjoy a temperate and healthy clime. Man alone, by his appetite for change, destroys its enjoyments; and where gentle streams should irrigate the land its soil is dyed in blood.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—The following circular has been addressed to Lord Palmerston on the late meeting of Parliament:—"Downing-street, Jan. 12, 1857. His meeting of Parliament having been fixed for despatch the most important business of great importance will then occur, the undersigned, as a Parliament, and I trust, therefore, that you will allow me to express my earnest hope that it may be consistent with your convenience to attend in your place in the House of Commons at the opening of the Session.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient and faithful servant, PALMERSTON

OPPOSITION TO THE PROPERTY AND INCOME TAX.—A public meeting was held at Exeter-hall on Wednesday evening, for the purpose of opposing the continuance of the property and income tax, fixed in the pound after the 5th of April next. There were about 2000 persons present, all members of the Income and Property Tax Association. The chair was taken by Mr. Norman Wilson, in the absence of Mr Alderman Sidney, the founder of the association; and among the gentlemen on the platform were Lord Redd, M.P.; Mr. T. Chambers, M.P.; Mr Apsley Pellatt, M.P.; Colonel Sir D. Cunyngham, M.P.; Mr. Whitmore, M.P.; T. D'Israeli, Mr. J Edmonds, Mr. Gowing, Mr W. C. Jay, Mr. Lovick, Mr. Patten, Mr. G. Walter, Mr Willey, &c. &c. Deputations were also present from Barnsley, Birmingham, Brentford, Brighton, Dorking, Huddersfield, Ipswich, Oxford, and Reading. Mr. C. F. Buott, the honorary secretary, read letters from General Sir Do Lacy Evans, M.P., Mr W. Scholefield, M.P., Mr. Mallins, M.P., and Mr. Hadfield, M.P., all expressing their regret at not being able to take part in the proceedings, but promising their support in the House of Commons. The secretary also stated that communications had been received from Lord Stanley, Derby, Devonport; Exeter, Hull, Leeds, Leicester, Maidstone, &c. Resolutions against the tax, in its present shape and amount, were passed unanimously. The chairman, Mr. Apsley Pellatt, M.P.; Mr. T. Chambers, M.P.; Mr. Pellatt, M.P., Col. Sir Duncan Macdougall, and Mr. J. A. Nicholay. Several speakers then came forward to address the meeting, but they were all unable to obtain any large measure of support in their overtures for a hearing

THE EDUCATIONAL MUSEUM. -The Committee of Privy Council on Education has arranged to open the new Educational Museum at the new buildings, South Kensington, on Thursday next. The museum will exhibit, under a proper classification, all important books, diagrams illustrations, and apparatus connected with education, already in use, or which may be published from time to time, either at home or abroad. The public will be admitted free on certain days of the week; and on other days, which will be reserved for students, opportunity will be given to examine and consult the objects exhibited with the utmost freedom. The articles exhibited at St. Martin's-hall in 1854, which were presented to the Society of Arts, and by that society given to the Education Board in order to found a museum will form part of the Educational Museum. The producers of apparatus, books, diagrams, maps, &c., used in teaching will have the privilege, subject to certain regulations, of placing their publications and specimens in the Museum, thus making them known to the public. It we understand that a desire to assist has been unanimously expressed by all the great educational societies and publishers. A catalogue is to be prepared which will contain the prices with which exhibitors may furnish for insertion. The books and objects will be grouped under the following divisions:—1. School buildings and fittings, forms, desks, slates, plans, models, &c. 2. General education, including geography, history, mathematics, foreign languages, history. 3. Drawing and the fine arts. 4. Music. 5. Household economy. 6. Geography and astronomy. 7. Natural history. 8. Chemistry. 9. Physics. 10. Mechanics. 11. Apparatus for teaching the blind and the deaf and dumb

ROYAL NAVAL BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—The annual Court of the Governors of this institution was held at the Thatched House Tavern, St. James's-street, on Monday last, Admiral Lord Ashley taking the chair. By the report of the committee it appears that £1678 had been expended on grants to the distressed families of naval officers. The income of the past year showed an increase of £151. The expenditure, too, which had itself exhibited an increase of £181. compared with that of the previous year. The total amount of invested capital at present amounted to £41,733 8s. 8d., in the Three per Cent Consols.

REFORM OF CRIMINALS. A numerous and influential meeting of the inhabitants of Chelsea took place in the Clock-house, King's-road, Chelsea, on Monday night—the Rev. J. C. Goodhart in the chair—in support of the Reformatory and Industrial Home for Male Criminals at Brixton. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. Mr. Cadman, Rector of St. George's, Southwark, and the Rev. Mr Robinson, who gave some interesting details, showing how persons discharged from prisons were suspected and avoided by friends and society, and, without character and the means to obtain food by their labour, were driven to the commission of fresh crimes to obtain the means of existence. In remedy of this evil the Criminal Reformatory came forward, and, giving a home to the discharged criminal, taught him some industrial occupation, and restored him to society a useful member, instead of a pest. The Rev. Mr. Cohen, chaplain to the City Prison, detailed his prison experiences, showing that many were driven to the commission of crime from the lack of any alternative. Resolutions approving the objects and principles of the Reformatory were adopted, and subscriptions entered into.

THE ROYAL BRITISH BANK.—Actions have been commenced against some of the shareholders, and bankruptcies and insolvencies will follow. A serious difficulty has arisen. Admiral Scott is acting in the benefit of the Act, to relieve themselves from the liabilities, as all creditors would have to be inserted in the schedules, and as there are some thousands the mere costs out of pocket would amount to several hundreds of pounds. A circular has been issued by an agency firm in the City offering to buy up any deposit account at the rate of 12s. in the pound, less the drawback already received.

THE BOOT AND SHOE TRADE.—A large meeting of master boot and shoe makers in the metropolis, including many of the principal members of the trade, was held at the [illegible] on Monday evening, for the purpose of considering the propriety of an immediate advance in the price of boots and shoes, in consequence of the rise in the price of leather. [illegible] was passed by acclamation recommending the adoption by the trade of an average advance in the price of boots and shoes in proportion to the rise in the price of leather.

FANQUET GIVEN BY THE QUEEN OF OUDE.—A magnificent banquet was given on Tuesday by the Queen of Oude, at Harley House, to the Chairman, Deputy Chairman, and Court of Directors of the Hon. East India Company. The banquet and wines were of the most recherché description, provided by Messrs. Bathe and Co., of the London Tavern.

DOCK WARRANTS.—On Monday last a public meeting of merchants, bankers, and other traders, was held at the London Tavern, for the purpose of entering a formal protest against the legal dictum laid down by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the case of Kingsford v. Merry, whereby the Lodor of a "delivery order" or "dock warrant," is debarred from recovering the property assigned if it can be shown that the assignor has obtained it improperly or by fraud. Baron Lionel Rothschild, M.P., presided; and among the gentlemen who surrounded him were Sir James Duke, Bart., M.P., Mr. Moffat, M.P., Mr. Gregson, M.P., Mr. Archibald Hastie, M.P., the Governor of the Bank of England, and most of the principal bankers of the City. In the course of the proceedings Mr. Archibald Hastie, M.P., said he had the authority of the Vice-President of the Board of Trade for stating that the Government were willing and most anxious to apply a remedy to the evil complained of.

MEETING OF UNEMPLOYED WORKMEN.—On Monday afternoon a second public meeting, consisting chiefly of artisans connected with the building trades, was held in Smithfield, for the purpose of adopting measures for giving effect to resolutions passed at the meeting held on the previous Monday. Several workmen addressed the meeting, which was very orderly, and resolutions in accordance with the objects of the meeting were agreed to. It was stated by one of the speakers that there are no less than 36,000 persons connected with the building trade out of employment

COOKY v. GOVERNESSES.—"I was one of about fifty ladies," &c. governess who applied last week, in reply to an advertisement for a situation as governess in a family in the neighbourhood of Kingsland. The applicants went from all parts of London and its environs; many were in consequence quite overcome with fatigue, having walked long distances to save expense. After having been kept standing in a cold draughty hall more than an hour, I at last obtained an interview with the lady, and learnt that the governess would consist in educating and taking the entire charge of the children, seven in number, two being quite babies; to perform for them all the menial offices of a nurse; make and mend clothes; to teach at least three accomplishments, and fill up the leisure hours of an evening by playing to company." For these combined duties the munificent sum of £10 per annum was offered. I ascertained further that the two domestic servants in the same family were paid respectively £12 and £10.

THE BULLION ROBBERY AND THE TURKISH BONDS.—The claims of Fanny Kay to the Turkish Coupons found at Pierce's house after his arrest, and which were proved to have been intrusted to him by Agar for the support of herself and her child, were argued at chambers on Wednesday morning before Baron Martin, the Judge who tried the case. Mr. Ficklin, the counsel, and Mr. Rees, the solicitor, appeared on the part of the South-Eastern Railway Company; Mr. Wontner for Pierce; Mr. Lewis for Burgess; and Mr. Sleigh represented Mr. Under-Sheriff Cooley. Baron Martin, after hearing the various parties, adjourned the further consideration of the matter till Monday next, in order that in the interim additional affidavits might be filed. The learned Judge, however, said his present opinion was that Fanny Kay was entitled to the Bonds, having been handed over by Agar to Pierce as trustee for and on behalf of her and her child previous to the conviction of Agar.

THE SAWARD FORGERY GANG.—James Townshend Saward and James Anderson, who stand charged with being concerned in the late gigantic system of forgeries, were again placed at the bar on Wednesday before the Lord Mayor, for further examination. The evidence was confined to that of a corroborative character, in relation to the forgeries on Messrs. Hunkey and Ransom's banks The witnesses Attwell and Hardwick were not in attendance, being understood that Mr. Giffard, as counsel for Saward, did not purpose cross-examining that day. The prisoners were again remanded

ROBSON, THE CRYSTAL PALACE FORGER.—It is said that Robson, who is now in Newgate, having been placed there to facilitate the identification of his person, has in consequence of his confinement evinced symptoms of aberration of mind The anxiety he has undergone centred upon his intellectually degraded position, and the indignities and personal suffering to which in common with all convicts sentenced to transportation, is subjected, have completely shaken his intellect. It is said he is unable to have assumed a form of intense mental labour. They can be little doubt that he will be removed to Bethlehem Hospital as a criminal lunatic, where, in all probability, he will shortly end his days, as he manifests symptoms of a complete constitutional decay.

FIRE AT SPITALFIELDS.—On Thursday morning, between four and five, a fire broke out in the extensive range of premises belonging to Mr. John Wilson, formerly of "Three Nests Tongues," Great Pearl-street, Spitalfields. The building was exceedingly antiquated, and contained nearly twenty rooms. At the time of the outbreak there were sleeping in the premises Mr and Mrs. Weston and five children, and several other persons. Some of whom had narrow escapes with their lives, the firemen got the fire entirely extinguished, but not until the building and all it contained was consumed. The contents were insured in the Sun, and the building in the Monarch.

THE NOTTING-HILL BURGLARS.—A FIGHT WITH THE POLICE. —In consequence of information received by Mr. Hughes, superintendent of the D division at Marylebone station, that several burglaries had lately been committed in Notting-hill and its vicinity, he directed Inspector Potter, of the same division, with Parsons, 182 D, active officers of the division, who were in plain clothes, with several other police constables who were in uniform, to patrol to the rear of the houses in question for the purpose of endeavouring to apprehend the burglars. Upon the arrival of this force at the spot, it was arranged that it should proceed to Westbourne-park Road, and that when constables were stationed in the rear of several of the houses there. About three o'clock on Wednesday morning the rattle of one of the constables was heard, this officer having seen two men get over a wall in the rear of the house No. 28, Westbourne-park Villas. The officer, Spencer, 368, went up to them, followed by Potter, Parsons, and three other constables; but one of the burglars, named Hughes, took out of his pocket a large iron jimmy, such as is used by gasfitters to remove screws from gas pipes, with which he struck at the officer who closed upon him. In striking so Mr Spencer received a blow which knocked him down, but the burglar was eventually secured, and taken to the station-house. Near where the struggle took place a screw-driver, a large pocket knife, two wax candles, and some lucifer matches were picked up, which there is no doubt were flung away by Hughes. The companion of Hughes, while this affray was going on, sprang over the wall, followed by Parsons and a constable named Soer. He swore that he would not be taken alive. Soer, however, succeeded in taking him to the station-house some lucifer matches and wax candles were found on him. Much alarm was caused during the affray. Many gentlemen got up, and, half-dressed, rushed out of their houses, and off gaols, in the charge of the police. One gentleman, who had a life preserver, was about to strike Parsons, 182 D, who was in plain clothes, as he was getting over a wall. In consequence of the numerous burglaries the proprietors of the houses in that locality are armed with revolvers

DARING GAROTTE ROBBERY.—On the evening of Friday, the 16th inst., Colonel Gordon, late of the Royal Artillery, after dining at the house of a friend at Chertsey, proceeded on foot to Shooter's-hill-road to Woolwich, and on arriving near what is known as the "Blue Gate on Woolwich-common, he was attacked by three artillerymen, who seized him by the throat, and commenced carrying off all the property about his person, including a silver snuff-box and a purse containing a quantity of silver, with which they got clear off. On Saturday detective officer Crouch, of the K division, examined the spot where the robbery took place; and, on instituting a strict search, found a soldier's pass, belonging to James Price, a private of the 5th battalion of Royal Artillery, who was taken into custody on suspicion. Price underwent an examination before Mr. Traill, the police magistrate on Monday afternoon, but was discharged, the only evidence of a suspicious nature beyond that mentioned being that, on the night in question, he did not return until twelve o'clock, three hours after the robbery, instead of eleven. Since the above occurrence orders have been issued by the Commandant (General Sir F. Williams), by which 170 men are stationed every evening as pickets along the different line of roads leading to and from the barracks.

HEALTH OF LONDON.—In the week that ended on Saturday the deaths registered in London were 1171; of these 589 were deaths of males, 582 those of females. In the ten years 1847-56 the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week was 1219; but for the purpose of comparison this should be raised proportionally to increase of population and the present number, he did not return until twelve o'clock, three hours after the robbery, instead of eleven. Since the above occurrence orders have been issued by the Commandant (General Sir F. Williams), by which 170 men are stationed every evening as pickets along the different line of roads leading to and from the barracks.

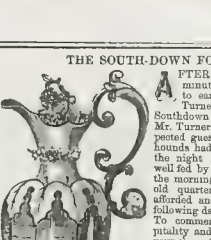
DEATH THROUGH TIGHT LACING.—An inquest was held at Leeds on Monday on the body of ANN ELIZA Durham, aged twenty-six, the surgeon who made a post-mortem examination of the body found the [illegible] very small, the lungs much congested, the heart much larger than natural, and the cavities full of blood. He considered death to have arisen from smallness of the chest, caused probably by tight lacing, disease of the valves of the heart, and depression of spirits. The verdict returned was, "Died from disease of the heart."—Leeds Mercury.

THE SOUTH-DOWN FOXHOUNDS.



AFTER a splendid burst of forty minutes a fine old fox was run to earth on the estate of J. S. Turner, Esq., of Churton, by the Southdown foxhounds, on Jan. 6, 1857. Mr. Turner would not allow his unexpected guest to be dug out until the hounds had been called off. During the night Reynard was bagged and well fed by his hospitable host, and in the morning was turned down in his old quarters, Deanland Wood, and afforded another excellent run on the following day, again saving his brush. To commemorate Mr. Turner's hospitality and kindness to the old fox, a very elegant silver claret-jug has been manufactured by Messrs. Folkard and Sons, of Brighton, and bears the following inscription:—"Presented to J. S. Turner, Esq., by the Deanland Wood Fox, for his kindness and hospitality on the 6th of January, 1857." Viscount Pevensey, Lieut.-Col. Heyburn, Lieut.-Colonel Thomas, Major Brown, Captain Bethune, and some sixteen other members of the hunt, have joined Mr. Reynard in the presentation of this interesting memorial. Mr. Elam, the owner of the coverts where Mr. Reynard generally resides, considers him to be about seven years old: and, though he makes tolerably free with the poultry-yard, Mr. Elam entertains a very great respect for his gallant lodger.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE publication of the handicaps for several of the great spring events has been the leading feature of the past week. The Chester Cup weights have of course been the subject of the closest scrutiny, and to us the principle on which they have been framed seems utterly inscrutable. Fifty out of the 126 are weighted from 4 st. to 4 st. 12 lb., a purely childish absurdity to begin with, as nearly every one of such starters will be ridden many pounds over-weight; while Flacrow, who is only a five-furlong horse at best, is honoured with the top weight—9 st. 2 lb. Although he is only one year her senior he is called upon to give 34 lb. to One Act (6 st. 10 lb.), who won the last Chester Cup, and is a perfect glutton for a distance. Melissa (8 st. 4 lb.) is only seventh on the list, and most unaccountably favoured; and, seeing that Fisherman received 2 lb. and beat Roger-Tichborne a neck at Weymouth, it is difficult to understand why he has now to give him 21 lb. Lance and Pretty Boy are each well in at 7 st. 11 lb., and Warlock very badly, at 7 st. 12 lb. One Act received 7 lb. from Yellow Jack last year, and just beat him a head, and now the unlucky chestnut has to give her 10 lb.! One might fancy that some race committee had been arranging the weights instead of the usual handicapper. It is an old saying that betting men will back anything that has four legs, and, certainly, when we saw them "hot" upon the miler, Mincepie, last Monday, for a race of this length and severity, it looks very much like it.

The death of the Duke of Rutland, aged seventy-eight, on Monday, has left no void in the racing world, as he had only one horse or so in training at Tom Taylor's, and his "light blue and purple sleeves" had become almost a thing of the past. Although he came to his estates when of age, after a twelve years' minority, his name did not appear on the Racing Calendar till the year 1817, and he had never more than twelve horses in training at one time. In 1811 he won the oaks with Sorcery, ridden by Sam Chifney; and in 1814 with Medora; and his regular jockey, Robinson, had the pleasure of landing Cadland a winner of the Derby after his memorable dead heat with Bill Scott on the Colonel. Newmarket was his favourite course; and some of his happiest days were spent near it at Cheveley Park, or the Palace, where the Duke of York, Beau Brummell, and Crabbe the poet, were all welcome guests. Oppidan, Quadrille, Scarborough, Flambeau, Flame, and Sisters, are among his animals; but, though Cadland did him good service, he never had "a great Cup horse," so to speak. His foxhounds constituted his greatest pleasure; and he had at Belvoir, when he died, a huntsman and a pack second to none in the kingdom. Goosey hunted them for many years, but they never reached in his day that state of efficiency, under Will Goodall. The present Duke, like his father, is a keen shot and Nimrod, but has no taste for the race and the starting-post.

The Waltham Abbey pantomime still furnishes food for quarrelling to those who still dabble in the dregs of steeplechasing. Northamptonshire, however, still stands up for this sport; and there is the prospect of a very fair two days, with three races on each, at Oundle, on Tuesday and Wednesday next. The entries for the Club Stakes quite savour of old Bean and Becher times. Tullaght, in Ireland, also holds its carnival on Monday.

The Cottesmore had a brilliant run on Tuesday, from Tilton Wood into the neighbourhood of Uppingham. The fog was so great at starting that but few got away with the hounds. Amongst the foremost of those who went through the run was Captain Bernal, and we hear that it was thought to be a better one, on the whole, and over a finer country, than even that with "the Duke's" on the previous day. Mr. Davenport, a well-known front-flight man in Cheshire, has joined the "Melton division," which seems to acquire strength every week. The North Staffordshire had a very good day on Monday. The meet was Leighford Hall, near Stafford, and was attended by several scarlets from the Atherstone and the Albrighton hunts. The first fox was lost after a good ringing run of 1 h. 20 mins., in consequence of a fresh fox crossing his line, and the second was killed after a capital run of 1 h. 10 mins. The third was then found within a very short distance of Stafford, and took them at a racing pace right through the Leighford coverts, and then to the left across the railway and away to the Whitemanes in the Albrighton country, where the scent became very cold and the hounds were stopped, five-and-twenty miles from their kennel. The pleasure of the second day was the reappearance of the veteran huntsman Joe Maiden in the saddle, after being absent from it for nearly two years, in consequence of the amputation of his left leg some four inches below the knee. The gradual contraction of the knee-joint for the five-and-twenty years since his boiler accident seems to have at last rendered it necessary to render his chance of riding to hounds a completely "forlorn hope." American invention, however, came at the nick of time to his aid; and by the perseverance and ingenuity of Mr. Edwin Osborne, of Saville-row (the English patentee of the "Palmer's Artificial Leg"), the knee has been got to act consentaneously, fitted with a leg which enables him, after his hitherto short practice on it, to walk very fairly with the aid of a stick, and to ride as well as ever he did. In fact, from the style in which he rode close up to his hounds and took his fences on Monday, it would have been impossible to observe that he had sustained any loss. Much as we were delighted to see this admirable huntsman once more in his glory, with his horn at his saddle-bow, we trust that this triumph for America in our hunting fields may not be the forerunner of another when the racing cracks of the Old and New Worlds meet over an English race-course.

Sancebox has gone to France, and Cobnut to Sardinia; Weatherbit and Janus, the steeplechaser, stand for sale at Tattersall's on Monday; and Vindex, Vandal, and John Cosser on the Monday following. Miss Bowe, Blue Bonnet, The Flapper, and Canezou have to foal shortly to the Flying Dutchman.

The grey hound saplings, Fall of Kars and Titled Treason, are for sale at £60 each or £80 the pair; the latter of them beat Hopbine, the winner of the Sundorne Challenge Cup, after three undecided courses at Bradwardine; and, as Lady Clara had to succumb at the same meeting to Goldfinder, it is to be hoped that the triumphant "Rs" and "Bs" will find their level at last in the Waterloo Cup. Shropshire has a coursing meeting, at Aston Oswestry, on Tuesday; Winmarleigh (Lancashire) and Holt (Worcestershire) are fixed for Wednesday, Crosby, Knipe Scar, and Epsom (Grand Open), for Thursday; and Nottingham (Open), for Thursday, Friday, and Saturday.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

LORD PALMERSTON'S circular has gone forth to the Liberal members of Parliament, with the usual announcement that important business will demand their presence at the opening of the Session. To the vacant seats in the House, the death of the aged Duke of Rutland now adds another - Lord Granby succeeding to the title, and North Leicestershire having, therefore, a congé d'élire in the case of a representative duly accredited by the power that governs those parts. Lord Granby, as a member of the House of Commons, appeared to be a man of earnest convictions, and though he usually spoke and voted, in our judgment, on the wrong side, especially in the debates on the war, in which he took the Russo-Manchesterian view of the case, it was impossible not to respect his sincerity. At one time there was an idea of his leading the Opposition, but for this he had neither the readiness nor the power. The House heard him tolerantly upon occasion, and showed him the usual favour due to Marquises, but he would have been an infliction had he frequently risen. He leaves two brothers in the Commons to represent Belvoir Castle.

The assassin of the Archbishop of Paris has been tried, and another instance has been afforded of the unseemly working of the Continental system of inquisition which makes the Judge a counsel in the cause. It is impossible that when the prisoner is obstinate and adroit the Judge should not become antagonistic, and eventually lose his temper; and then what should be a calm investigation changes to a wrangle. In the case of Verger the difficulty was increased by the man's violent and ungovernable disposition, which occasionally manifested itself in almost frenzied exclamations and abuse. He was, of course, condemned to die. The spectators conducted themselves with as much indecency as the accused, and with less excuse; and, in answer to his frantic appeals to them, they grinned, shouted, shook their fists, and lavished virulent language upon a man in the clutch of the gaolers. As to the condition of his mind the question is not very difficult. It is stated that his mother died insane, and that one of his brothers is in confinement. But Verger was perfectly aware, and had been so for a year, that he was about to defy the law in slaying his enemy, and therefore, according to our own rules, the asylum cannot claim him for the executioner. Among the sentimental nonsense which has been written about the catastrophe, the Archbishop has been called a "martyr." This is to degrade the noblest title that man can bear. Did M. Sibour go willingly to death? Did he know that he was in the slightest danger? A less voluntary death than his can hardly be conceived. But the Romish Church has a habit of overacting, and over-colouring, even when she has good material to deal with; and if she will turn tragedy into melodrama, she must be content with the enthusiasm of the vulgar.

Two large meetings of the working classes, or, rather, of the classes that would work if they could, have been held in Smithfield. A great mass of labourers, for employ from circumstances over which, as they truly say, they have no control, has gathered to consider what they shall do for sustenance. Let us do justice to the order and temperance which characterised their conduct, while regretting that the remedies prescribed to them by their orators were empirical. The redistribution of property is a phrase which no sensible English mechanic ought to tolerate. But the right of the man who is in need to be relieved from the poor-rate was very properly asserted, and we cannot feel surprised that, knowing the brutality of workhouse officials, as constantly brought before the magistrates, these men expressed a determination to claim their right in such force as would prevent porters and relieving officers from insulting them. The Bumbles, in their parochial zeal for the rates, may prove to have done more mischief to property than their masters dream of. But the great remedy for over-supply of labour is emigration, and those who can think a little further than others should labour for a national recognition of this way of escape so providentially open to our population. The Greeks were the best colonists that ever existed, and how did they colonise? By sending scoundrels, or incapables, or the wretched, to plant homes round the Mediterranean? No, they sent forth their young and vigorous men, and bade them make a new Greece for themselves, but never to forget the old country; and the counsel was followed, and in every colony one altar was kindled "to the welfare of the old homes."

There has been no particular railway grievance for some time, and we are willing to hope that the various accidents and examples of the past twelvemonth have produced a salutary effect upon the direction and the administration of our iron roads. A statement has, however, appeared, to which this is a very good time to call attention. It is notorious that when an accident occurs the country around the spot is scoured for medical aid, and that the professional men instantly hurry to the spot, and yield their services with noble promptness and humanity. But it is further said that in various cases the railway company whose negligence has caused the accident, and whose servants have summoned the surgeons, refuse to remunerate the latter, and that they have been unable to substantiate their claims, owing to legal quibble, ever powerful to defeat the honest man and deliver the rascal. Now, if this be the case, the conduct of the companies in question might be characterised by a stronger epithet than we care to use in connection with ex parte statements. On the Russian railways, we believe, each train carries a surgeon, and though the mass of Russian surgeons are very bad, his presence is better than nothing. What the passengers are to do if the Doctor himself is smashed we are not quite sure - perhaps as he wears the Czar's uniform the population would consider it profane to suppose that accident could touch him.

The dynasty of mountain monarchy is subject to perpetual change. As for Mont Blanc "they discrowned him long ago." The "giant of the Western Star" has also gone down before the Asiatic Goliath, who has long been supposed to be the highest mountain in the world. But recent measurements have once more shifted the crown; and the mighty Dhawalagiri, with his 26,862 feet, must take his place below the throne of a still mightier monster, to whom no name was supposed to belong, and whom the Mountain-Warwick, or Kingmaker, an officer in the East India Company's service, proposes to call Mount Everest. At a meeting of the Asiatic Society, however, a protest was made the other day against this nomenclature: and it was stated that the great mountain had for ages been known to the natives as Devadhunga—a lofty and euphonious title, by which earth should certainly do him homage.

A NEW YEAR'S GIFT TO THE POPE.—The Commissioners of Sacred Archæology on the 31st ult. presented a New Year's gift to the Pope, consisting of a circular marble table, containing, in a central octagonal compartment, a copy in marbles of various colours of an ancient painting of the good Shepherd, discovered in the vault of a cubiculum in the catacombs of St. Callixtus, near the crypt of the Pope and martyr, St. Cornelius. Letter from Rome, Jan. 15.

AN INDIAN TEA COMPANY.—A new company has been started in Calcutta, under the title of the Cachar Tea Company. There are 3000 shares at thirty rupees each; of these 2000 have been taken up and paid for, that is to say, the first instalment called for has been paid. Three rupees a share is the first call, and six the next, payable the year following.—Sun, and Elder's Homeward Mail.

MUSIC.

THE only noticeable concerts of this week have been the oratorio performances of the Sacred Harmonic Society and Mr. Hullah. At Exeter-hall Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" (Hymn of Praise) and Mozart's "Requiem" were given for the second time this season, on Wednesday morning. The Sacred Harmonic Society made effort performed these two masterpieces, and always together. This season their performance is better and more successful than ever. Both of them are works of extreme difficulty; and the clearness and smoothness with which they are now executed is the natural result of frequent competition. The principal solo parts in the "Lobgesang" were sung by Madame Clara Novello, Mrs. Lockey, and Mr. Sims Reeves. To these performers, in the "Requiem," Mr. Thomas was added. They all acquitted themselves admirably. The hall was full to overflowing. The performance of "Elijah," at St. Martin's Hall, was good in parts, but very defective as a whole. The choruses were sung with tolerable correctness, though the nuances were not nicely observed, and the necessary loudness of the organ throughout the whole performance was positively oppressive. The two great solo parts were in very incompetent hands. Mr. Thomas, though a good, steady oratorio singer, is destitute of the dramatic element, and, therefore, failed entirely in sustaining the character of the Prophet; and the principal soprano part, which demands a Jenny Lind or a Clara Novello, was quite beyond the powers of Miss Banks, who, de reste, is a young singer of much promise. Mr. Sims Reeves, however, and Miss Dolby sang the tenor and contralto parts, and, as usual, sang admirably.

OUR most eminent performers, both vocal and instrumental, are busy in the provinces, and will, of course, continue to be so till the commencement of the London season. M. Jullien, with his magnificent orchestra, is perambulating the country, giving "Beethoven Nights," "Mendelssohn Nights," &c., on the same grand scale and with the same brilliant success as in London. He is also accompanied by Herr Formes and Madame Gassner, whose vocal performances add greatly to the attraction of the concerts. Mr. Charles Hallé is carrying on his classical Chamber Concerts at Manchester, and delighting the numerous amateurs of that highly musical town. At the concert of the 8th inst. the principal executed pieces were Schubert's Trio in B flat for the piano, violin, and violoncello - an admirable composition, though little known to our public; Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor for the same instruments; and Beethoven's Sonata in F for the piano and violin. In these pieces Hallé was assisted by Ernst and Piatti, and the result of their union was perfection. Hallé, moreover, played as solos chamber morceaux of Chopin and Stephen Heller.

OUR admirable composer and pianist, Mr. GEORGE OSBORNE, is at present on a tour in Ireland, and is everywhere received by his countrymen with enthusiasm. His appearance at the last concert of the Dublin Philharmonic Society is thus spoken of by the Freeman's Journal—a paper which contains a trustworthy criticism: "Mr. George Osborne, as a pianist, next claims our attention. Weber's 'Concert-Stück' we never heard so well played as by this gentleman. His reading manifested a thorough conception of the author; and his playing was full of vigour, brilliancy, elasticity of touch, and roundness of tone. He also played a notturno, entitled 'L'Esperanza,' a deliciously-flowing theme, with accompaniment for the left hand, in arpeggi, and a study in E minor, composed by himself. Both pieces he rendered with consummate skill. Miss Catherine Hayes and George Osborne are natives of Ireland, and the country may well be proud of two such artists."

THE "Traviata" at the Paris Italian Opera is drawing full houses, and receives great applause. But we can gather from the prevailing tone of the journals that this applause is bestowed more upon the youthful and charming Piccolomini than upon the opera itself. The Parisian critics agreeing in their estimate both of the work and of the fair prima donna with the majority of their London brethren. The "Trovatore" (in our opinion Verdi's chef-d'œuvre) has been brought out at the Grand Opéra in a French dress, under the title of "Le Trouvere," with some additions to the music made by the composer. Its success has been less than was expected; though two reasons may be given for this result: first the opera is now no novelty, the public being already familiar with it in its original form; and secondly, it is at this very time better performed in Paris at the Italian Opera.

MR. LUMLEY (says Galignani), who has been in Paris a few days, has left for Italy, to conclude some important engagements for Her Majesty's Theatre. Mr. Balfe, the popular composer (the same journal adds), is at present in Paris, and has been laid up by an attack of bronchitis, but is now convalescent. He is, it is stated, engaged in the composition of a new opera on an original subject.

ROSSINI has taken up his permanent abode in Paris. He is well in health, but a sort of malade imaginaire, subject to hypochondria and nervous irritation. He sees a few intimate friends in a quiet way, but does not go into what is called society, and refuses to enter the doors of a musical theatre, having a rooted dislike to the dramatic music of the day.

ON Thursday (last week) an evening concert was given in the theatre of the Harrow Literary Institution, in aid of its funds. The following eminent vocal performers gave their assistance: - Miss Messent, the Misses Brougham, Mrs. T. Rolfe, and Mr. Tilyard. Mr. Haskins performed on the pianoforte, and Mr. Case on the concertina. The programme presented a choice selection of music, and the whole performance gave great satisfaction to a crowded audience.

THE THEATRES, &c.

SUCH is the success of the pantomimes that we have but little at present to report in the way of novelty: indeed, nothing at all at the large theatres. The Christmas holidays have been bountiful patrons of the more important dramatic establishments. It is only the less favoured places of entertainment that have felt the good of the necessity to produce new pieces. Of these we now proceed to give some account.

STRAND.—It is to Mr. E. Stirling that we are indebted for the novelty at this theatre. It is entitled "The Jew's Daughter." The heroine is impersonated by Miss Kate Percy, a débutante, who has made a favourable impression in the character. Leah is in love with a nobleman guilty of a political offence, and condemned to death, but who is ignorant of the lady's passion. When, however, she proposes to him a marriage, that she may be entitled to his rank, and thus facilitate her union with a friend, he consents to the ruse without suspicion. His expected execution, however, does not take place; and, fortunately for the lady, he finds that he really loves her, and reluctantly adopts measures for their immediate divorce. Leah appears not to be at all satisfied with this state of affairs, and the convenient friend soon learns the policy of conceding his supposed claim. Leah and the pardoned Lord are therefore reconciled, and a story, which is conducted in an interesting manner, is thus brought to a happy conclusion.

MARYLEBONE.—Mr. Emery has commenced his management here with much promise, and produced a new drama with success. The piece, which is the composition of Messrs. Harris and Williams, is named "Ruth Oakley." The heroine is a blacksmith's wife, who runs away with Lord Walter Gayton, and leaves not only her husband but a child for the tempter. That child the honest blacksmith swears she shall never see again. Nor does she; for, though the stern man subsequently relents, she is blinded by lightning at the very moment when she might otherwise have had her wish gratified. The nobleman weds another woman, but receives his reward; for, meeting Paul Oakley, he is compelled to fight a duel, and falls. The poor man is arrested on a charge of murder, and the child is stolen by mountebanks. A reunion, however, is ultimately accomplished. The husband is acquitted, the child restored, and the wife pardoned. Mr. Emery performs the part of the honest and wronged blacksmith; and Miss Fanny Clifford, as his erring spouse, was pathetic. The situations are very effective, though the plot is certainly open to objection both as to subject and treatment.

SURREY.—This theatre has also produced a new drama. It is in three acts, and entitled "A Bird in the Hand worth Two in the Bush." The author is Mr. Phillips, who has closely copied the Parisian form of construction, and carried one and the same scene, an old baronial interior—throughout the piece. In other respects his treatment is thoroughly British, particularly in the article of names. Here we have Mr. Praiseworthy (Mr. Shepherd), who feigns himself dead, in order to test the respective characters of his nephews, Reginald (Mr. Basil Potter) and Theodore Prodigal (Mr. Calvert). There is also an old friend, Major Stormont (Mr. Vollaire), who counsels the ruse; and a Mr. Capias, a lawyer (Mr. H. Widdicomb). The materials of this drama may thus be seen at a glance; nor is the moral difficult of apprehension. Reginald, whose aristocratic marriage had pleased his uncle, and Theodore, whose loss of a sum of money, and humble affection for an amiable and modest girl, had incurred his suspicion and displeasure, are both put to the test by the contents of the will, and soon change places in consequence. Mr. Shepherd played old Praiseworthy, who disguises himself as his own steward, with commendable puns and well-practised effect. Widdicomb, in the joint capacity of low attorney and inexorable dun, was highly whimsical. The dialogue is managed with stage tact, and went far to ensure the success of the piece.

DRURY LANE.—Mr. C. Mathews reappeared on Monday, and played with spirit, but his arm in a sling testified to the accident from which he has just recovered. The part was that of Hans Mertz, in "Somebody Else." The house, which was overflowing, welcomed warmly the restoration of the favourite actor to the stage.

MISS JULIA ST. GEORGE.—The practice of our most interesting actresses taking to "Readings" and "Entertainments" is fast extending. The interesting cantatrice with whose name we have headed this paragraph, following in the steps of Miss P. Horton, has commenced a series of performances in Liverpool, under the title of "Home and Foreign Lyrics," which, we learn from the journals, have come off at Clayton Hall, and been among the leading attractions of the Christmas season. As a burlesque and comic actress and singer Miss St. George has already achieved a brilliant reputation. Her fine contralto voice has stood her in good stead in her Entertainment, and shows to great advantage in the air and recitative of "Sapphic," "The Gipsy Song," "The Pastor," and "Joan of Arc." The lady can read and execute her text with the civilised world, including short-hand, impersonations, songs, and local characteristics (changes of costume she intends rapidly to effect). No doubt we shall soon meet with Miss St. George in her native county in London, and shall be then prepared to give her a hearty welcome. The music is provided by Mr. J. P. Duggan, and has been much commended.

SHAKESPEARE AND MUSIC.—Mr. Douglas Thompson, of Cheltenham (whose admirable lecture at Reading we noticed in our last impression), gave a reading from Shakespeare's play of "Macbeth," on Tuesday evening, the 20th inst., to a crowded audience, at the All Saints' School-room, in Margaret street, Cavendish-square. Mr. Thompson prefaced the tragedy by a few remarks on the important advantages resulting from the study and practice of elocution; and on the importance of joining "the language of motion with the language of ideas." Mr. Thompson gave with considerable skill Lady Macbeth's first scene, reading her husband's letter; and also with great power the well-known sleep-walking scene (which, from the number of speakers, is a most difficult one to read). The scene descriptive of the remorse of Macbeth after the murder of Duncan, and the remonstrances of Lady Macbeth on his untimely want of purpose, were admirably given. One of the passages, perhaps, which the audience most warmly applauded was the celebrated one commencing

To-morrow! and to-morrow! and to-morrow

The reader was assisted by the members of the choir of All Saints' Church, who gave Locke's Music in a very effective manner, under the able direction of Mr. Redhead, the organist. The reading of the play was concluded in a most spirited style with the dialogue between Macbeth and Macduff before their final struggle; and Mr. Thompson sat down amid the loud and well-merited applause of his hearers. The room was crowded with ladies and gentlemen, among the latter we noticed a large number of the clergy.

THE INTERIOR OF RUSSIA.—A new attraction of considerable importance and beauty has been added to the Great Globe, Leicester-square, Exhibition: a drama of Russia, painted by Mr. Charles Marshall, which presents tableaux of its scenery and population, and particularly the sites of recent events. These are set off with what are called scenic effects. A tour of the Baltic and Black Sea, the Danubian Principalities, and the Ural Mountains, is made remarkably interesting. The whole is concluded with a view of Nijni Novogrod during the fair, and the panaramas of St. Petersburg and Moscow, including the Czar's Coronation in the Cathedral of the Assumption. This series of historic illustrations must become exceedingly popular.

"CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF ENGLAND." Kent and Co. The first volume of this popular and interesting work has just been issued. It furnishes a very faithful record of the great events of English history from the period of ancient Druidism to the wars of the rival Roses. Throughout it bears evidence of research and discrimination, and is free from political and religious bias. It is written in a clear, vigorous, and popular style; and the name of the author, William Howitt, who has undertaken the history from the reign of Edward I. - is a sufficient guarantee for the literary ability of the work. The distinguishing peculiarity of this history is that it does not confine its attention to King's palaces, to council chambers, and to battle plains; but tells the story of the Anglo-Saxon people—traces the gradual development of their national strength the growth of their laws and constitution—and their progress in the arts of life. The people are thus furnished with a history of themselves, not merely with a history of their rulers. The illustrations (more than three hundred in number) embrace historical scenes, authentic portraits, and scenes of the manners, customs, and costumes of the people, together with views of the most interesting localities famous in English history. Separate chapters, amply illustrated, are devoted to English architecture. Of all the good and cheap publications which John Cassell has issued, we are inclined to the opinion that this English history is the best. The volume has a carefully-prepared index, with dates.

THE POET BERANGER AND THE EMPRESS EUGENIE.—It was lately stated in the Journal de Bruxelles that the Empress, being informed that the annual sum allowed to Beranger by his publisher, M. Perrotin, was not sufficient to provide for him in his old age, had privately intimated to M. Perrotin that she would willingly contribute from her own private purse enough to raise the poet's income to 6000f. a year; but her Majesty added that she wished the matter to be so managed as not to let Beranger know the source from which his accession of fortune derived. It is now made known that it came from the extended sale of his writings. The article in the Brussels journal contained some very illiberal and insulting remarks upon Beranger, who, it further asserted, had been informed by M. Perrotin, contrary to the desire of her Majesty, of the kind little scheme she had devised for his benefit, and Beranger was reproached for having, notwithstanding this, accepted her bounty, and written her a very grateful letter of acknowledgment. The publication of these statements has drawn forth a letter from M. Perrotin, in which he thus narrates the affair:—"In the year 1850 I happened to be in conversation about the health and the circumstances of Beranger, proposed to him, through a person in her confidence, her own servants would attend to him, and that a physician should be named by me, and which I myself would select, at her own private cost. The proposal was indeed a royal one, and worthy of a noble heart; but I felt I had no right to accept it. It was only Beranger who could have a right to do so, and when I had obtained his permission to inform him of the proposal which had been made he entirely approved of my conduct, saying that he would not have understood my conduct if I had acted otherwise. He did more than this; he wrote me a letter in which he expressed, in excellent terms, the gratitude which at the bottom of his heart he felt for the kindness that had been shown him; and he even added, that he had never been richer than he was at that moment—that he had never needed a larger income; and that his gratitude was the more sincere since he did not accept the benefits with the offer of which he had been honoured. This is all that has taken place upon the subject."

MEMORIAL TO THE RIGHT HON. EDMUND BURKE.—The Rector of Beaconsfield, where lived and died Edmund Burke, and where, in the church, his ashes repose, has issued a circular earnestly calling the attention of the public to the sadly-neglected state of the illustrious orator, and asking for subscriptions to secure the erection of such a public memorial as Beaconsfield to one who deserved so well of his country. A committee to carry out this truly-national object has, it appears, been formed, consisting of the venerable Edward Bickersteth, Archdeacon of Buckingham; the Rev. John Gould, B.D., Rector of Beaconsfield; George Atkinson, Serjeant-at-law, Serjeants' Inn; and Peter Burke, Esq., Inner Temple, London; and an account has been opened, called "The Beaconsfield Memorial Fund," with the following bankers, viz. Messrs. Dixon, Brooks, and Dixon, 25, Chancery-lane, London; the [illegible] Bank, Dublin; and Messrs. Persons and Thompson, Old Bank, Oxford. Subscriptions will be thankfully received by any of the members of the committee; or, if more convenient, may be paid to one of the above-named bankers, to the account mentioned.

SKETCHES OF IRISH LIFE.

RETURNING FROM MARKET, A SCENE IN THE COUNTY OF KILKENNY.—DRAWN BY E. FITZPATRICK.

THE IRISH SCHOOLMASTER.

Amongst the variety of "professors" that practise on the Irish peasantry in the shape of horse and cow doctors, bone-setters, and the like, perhaps there is not a more distinguished individual than the Hedge Schoolmaster.

Educated in a seminary similar to that in which he presides, having there acquired all his former preceptor's knowledge, he has either stepped into his shoes on his demise, or set up an establishment on his own account, trusting his success to the favourable opinion the neighbours had formed of his abilities during his years of probation. The Hedge Schoolmaster is, therefore, greatly respected by the peasantry whose children he has undertaken to educate; he is ever a welcome guest at their homes, gets the best "bit and sup" and the warmest corner at their firesides. Here he seems as much at home and more at his ease than the hospitable owner of the domicile he has condescended to visit, and whom he repays by astonishing with his intimate knowledge of past events, gleaned generally from antiquated newspapers: he can even tell of things to come, in a style equal, if not superior, to the prophetic pages of Moore's Almanack, which popular annual he is seldom or ever known to agree with. He is generally, too, a proficient in music, and on Sunday evenings, in the summer time, gives the boys and girls an opportunity of enjoying themselves on "the green" in a jig or country dance to the sounds of his violin. But as human nature is never perfect, even in the wisest of mankind, there is one failing inseparably allied with the Hedge Schoolmaster—he is a little too fond of "the drop;" his indulgence in which, though it occasionally mars his dignity in some respects, is amply atoned for in others; for, as the spirit of the glass ascends to his head, the pent-up learning as quickly escapes from that abode in words of learned length and thundering sound."

Now there may be, as is often the case, a rival schoolmaster in the adjacent village, and he too, either by accident or design, might be present on one of those festive occasions. The meeting of those worthies is as "Greek to Greek." No two gamecocks could regard each other more fiercely, and the encounter of wits is often as decisive and deadly. Here lies the Hedge Schoolmaster's real danger. If in the opinion of the excited company he is put down in the discussion, even on such a point as the "Irish tutor" puzzled the great Dr. O'Toole, when he asked him the exact position Ballyragget occupied on the globe, his fame is gone. The cry is up through the country, "The master was beat in the 'larnin';" and in a day or two the schoolmaster is literally "abroad," his grove deserted, and his pupils fled to his more witty or accomplished rival.

THE IRISH SCHOOLMASTER.—DRAWN BY E. FITZPATRICK.

WHALE STRANDED AT WINTERTON.

WHALE STRANDED AT WINTERTON.

THIS fine specimen of the whale tribe was driven ashore at Winterton by the gales which visited the coast of Norfolk on the 6th inst. When the whale found himself upon land he roared loudly, and he struggled most lustily to regain the deep. His full length is 48 feet; compared with which the proportions of the jaws are very small, measuring only 8 feet; eye small, the span of ball 5 inches, sight of eye between the lids 1½ inch; and there are two orifices in the middle of the head. The upper jaw is provided with about 400 (on each side) plates of whalebone or baleens, and each is furnished with very soft tufts of white hair sprouting from the inner part to the blowing-tubes, which is quite bare, and formed with a pinky horny substance. He has two pectorals, and a dorsal fin eight feet from tail. The tail measures from tip to tip (sideways) 11 feet; the widest part across, 28 inches. The pectorals, dorsal, and tail are all quite smooth. A series of folds, running lengthways, commences from corner of mouth about two feet long, and continues to the under part of the body, and terminates at eighteen feet from tip of lower jaw. The lower jaw quite bare, smooth, and covered with a black leathery skin, and projects three inches all round the upper jaw. The colour of the outer coat is dark brown on the back, vanishing off towards the body of a bluish grey. The body is white; also about two feet of the nose and baleen is white, the rest of the outer part is black.

We understand that the skin, head, and tail were removed from the carcase for exhibition. The whale is stated to weigh about 25 tons.

EMBANKMENT OF THE THAMES.

THIS very desirable public work proceeds slowly, but it is most efficiently executed. A good specimen may be seen on the north bank, between Vauxhall-bridge and the new Chelsea-bridge works.

The accompanying View represents a portion in progress by Mr. Jay, the contractor, under the Woods and Works, extending nearly from the first-named bridge to the entrance to the Grosvenor Canal, Chelsea, a distance of about ¼ mile; the work is being continued further westward, by Mr. Jackson, of Pimlico, from the said canal, to join the new bridge to Battersea Park, and to continue towards Chelsea Hospital; and, if carried up to Battersea-bridge, it will be one of the greatest modern improvements in or near the metropolis.

The entrances to the different docks, canals, &c., are spanned by straight cast-iron girders, and the roadway made good over, so as to avoid any obstruction to the public, and will thus afford an uninterrupted promenade for the whole distance; the foundation, as shown in the Drawing, is done by what is called half-tide work; and the large alongside the piles contains a double pumping-engine, for the purpose of drawing off the water to enable the workmen to dig out the foundation for the bricklayers; and further on are men driving sheet piling for the purpose of continuing the dam.

The distance from Vauxhall-bridge to the sign of William IV., opposite Messrs. Smith's distillery, was executed by Mr. Cubitt, and consists of a splendid waterside roadway, varying from thirty to forty yards in width, planted for some distance with trees; forming at present a pleasant walk for the inhabitants of the neighbourhood.

PROGRESS OF THE EMBANKMENT OF THE THAMES AT CHELSEA.

FOSSILS FOUND IN BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.

A DEPOSIT of fossils has recently been discovered in a bed of clay on the farm of Mr Greaves, at Tingewick Bucks, which has excited considerable curiosity and speculation as to their nature and origin. They were found by some labourers, in digging clay for bricks, at the depth of about six feet. Mr. Stowe, surgeon, of Buckingham, upon washing some hundreds of the fossils ascertained them to be marine vegetation which, if it had not grown where it was found, had been washed out of the chalk range, as most of the fossils are striated or interspersed by thin veins of chalk. The substance which forms the bulk of them is a pure marl of a yellowish colour, the shapes are so varied that it is impossible to describe them in words; and the number of them is immense, as they extend over many square yards of the field, and are as thick in the clay in which they are found as pebbles in a street. Many of them are like nuts, others are like Elizabethan mince-pies and oysters. Others are like roots of ginger and compressed mushrooms of all sizes—the smaller or button-shaped ones simulating the mince-pies, and the larger ones so like biscuits that at an evening party they were put on the supper-table and were taken for real biscuits. We have been favoured with a few of these "medals of creation," and the outlines of many more, and we hear that they have been sent to two or three professors of geology and botany, who have not yet determined what to designate them, or to what part of the cryptogamic class they belong.

We understand that Mr. Stowe has been almost overwhelmed with some 170 letters applying for specimens; but he is at present unable to go on satisfying the claimants, as the men have ceased to dig clay for the season. They appear to be concretions of chalky matter round some vegetable (marine) forms which have decayed in lapse of time, and so not strictly fossilised vegetables.

From the specimens we have received, the best Mr. Stowe could find, we have engraved a few; but there are such varieties of shapes that it would be endless to represent them: they are concretions of fantastic shapes, and from their depth in the clay, and being of chalk, must have been an early deposit of our geological era.

MONUMENT TO SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

THIS handsome testimonial to our distinguished statesman and historian has been sculptured by Mr. Theed, and is to be placed in Westminster Abbey as soon as the tablet is provided with an inscription. The requisite funds were raised by means of subscription of the friends and admirers of Sir James Mackintosh; a committee of noblemen and gentlemen being formed to carry out the work—of which committee the Marquis of Lansdowne is chairman, and the Right Hon. Sir Robert H. Inglis was honorary secretary.

The monument is about nine feet high, and is of graceful design: it is surmounted by a bust of Mackintosh. Beneath is the genius of British literature lamenting the loss of the historian; and upon the sods of the base, which bears the inscription-table, are sculptured figures of Clemency and Philosophy. Sir James Mackintosh has now been dead nearly a quarter of a century; so that the above memorial must be regarded as a tardy tribute to his attainments and private worth.

NEW BUCKINGHAM GATE.

WHOEVER remembers the neglected state of St. James's Park some forty years since must be disposed to give credit to the activity and taste of the successive heads of the office of Woods and Works to whom the care of these "lungs of the metropolis" is intrusted. The George IV., "maker of new streets," saw the landscape-gardening of St. James's Park, the lake of which has recently been emptied, in order to improve the bed, by removal of refuse and the laying of concrete, and, at a reduced depth, to lessen the results of accidents in the skating season, and to facilitate any future cleansing. This garden, by the way, was made for the people just at the time when the capricious Sovereign applied to Parliament for the improvements which ended in the rebuilding of Buckingham House. This was, indeed, an ingenious "job."

The scene of our Illustration, the new Lodge and Buckingham Gate, is in some respects a more important public improvement than the boon of the garden. It has sprung out of the alterations at the Pimlico entrance to St. James's Park, adjoining Buckingham Palace. A few of the houses of Great James street have been removed; the great part of the line has been spared, and we are glad of it, for they are some of the most cheerful houses in the metropolis, with their park prospect, and most desirable aspect for artists. Several houses in Pimlico have been cleared away. The new office of the Duchy of Cornwall has been erected at the angle of the road, and much more remains to be done ere the plan is completed. Meanwhile it was found that the Park gate was inconvenient, and was likely to become more so on the opening of the new wing of the Palace at Pimlico. Accordingly, the Park Lodge, which stood between the terminus of the road that passes in front of the Wellington Barracks and that through the Park has been removed; likewise the single gates, and in place of them handsome double gates, two to each entrance, have been erected; and a new lodge has been built, for which purpose a large area has been taken from the ground to the west of the Chapel Royal Barracks. This improvement has been found necessary for the additional traffic by the road newly opened past St. James's Palace-court and Marlborough-house, and in a line with the Park mall, past Buckingham Palace, to Pimlico. Another people's road has originated with the life and bustle of the full tide of the season. The style of the gates is good, and the stone piers and cast-iron gates are decidedly an improvement upon the brick piers and lumbering wooden gate of former days. The change is also early: and we hope to see the system of taking down and rebuilding the lodge at Buckingham Gate, and the new gates and piers and approaches to the park, has been £2450.

A SINGULAR CASE.—A case which has excited a great deal of interest lately came on for hearing, in the Court of Queen's Bench, last Saturday. A habeas corpus had been obtained to bring up Alicia Race, a child under ten years of age, under the following circumstances:—It appeared that the father of Alicia Race was a sergeant of marines, and was killed in the late attack on Petropaulovski; but, previously to that, when on board H.M.S. Pique, he wrote a letter addressed to his wife, in which he expressed a presentiment of death, and recommended his children, a boy and a girl, to the care of their mother. The deceased was a Protestant, and his widow a Catholic, and the children, after the death of their father, were placed the boy at the Sailors' Boys School, Chadstock, Devonshire, and the girl at the Sailors' Female Orphan Home, at Hampstead, of which latter asylum the Rev. H. Bickersteth, Incumbent of Christ Church, Hampstead, was the chaplain. In October last the boy was removed from the school at Chadstock and given up to the mother, at her request; Captain Fitzherbert, the secretary, admitting the right of the mother to have the child given up to her. A similar application was made for the female child by the mother, the Roman Catholic priest having told her that he would not send the child to school unless the girl was given up also. This application was refused, on the ground—first, that the child had no wish to leave the school and adopt the Roman Catholic faith, because she was attached to the life she had rarely attended the Roman Catholic church; and secondly, that the Royal Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund stood in loco parentis to the child, and that they declined to give her up. Mr. Whiteside, Lord Campbell delivered the judgment of the Court, which was that the child should be delivered up to the mother. Mr. O'Malley made an application on behalf of the authorities of the Orphan School, that the judgment of the Court be not immediately executed. Mr Robert Sweeting, one of the attorneys for the school, stated in his affidavit that a bill had been filed at the instance of the managers of the institution in Chancery, and that Alicia Race was now a ward of that Court. By leave of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley the motion for an injunction to restrain the mother from taking possession of the child stood for hearing at the sitting of the Court this morning; and it was further proved by the affidavit that the mother intended, as soon as she had obtained possession of her daughter, to take her to Ireland, where she would be out of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. Lord Campbell was of opinion that the order for the delivery of the child ought to be immediately executed. They could take no notice whatever of the injunction. The motion in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, which was heard on the same day, was for the appointment of a fit and proper person, other than the defendant Race, as guardian of the plaintiff, an infant, and for an injunction restraining the defendant from interfering with the infant plaintiff's education, or from further proceeding under the writ of habeas corpus which had been issued by the Court of Queen's Bench, or from acting upon any order which had been, or might be, made in the matter by the Court. The defendant's counsel applied for permission to answer the affidavits, the defendant and her solicitor undertaking that the infant should not be withdrawn from the jurisdiction, but should be forthcoming whenever required, and undertaking to abide by any order which the Court might think proper to make. His Honour granted the application for further time, but reminded the parties that a violation of the undertaking would be treated as strictly as a breach of an injunction.

AN EXPENSIVE PLEA.—An action was brought against the Bank of France, before the Tribunal of Commerce, by the heirs of a retired Captain of the Army, named Lavergne, of Tours, to obtain from it payment of 39,360f., the amount of notes alleged to have been destroyed by him in a fit of insanity. The plaintiffs stated that this person, whose mind had been affected for many years, had since 1838 been possessed with the idea of imitating an Englishman of Exeter, of whom he had read in the newspapers, who had burned a number of bank-notes, and then committed suicide. On the 26th June last Capt. Lavergne blew out his brains, and on a table was a paper setting forth that he left his property, amounting to 50,000f., and 726f. in gold and silver. The latter sum was found, but the notes had disappeared. In the grate, however, were a quantity of cinders caused by the burning of paper and the remains of several banknotes. As, therefore, it was morally certain that the notes had been burned, it was contended that the Bank was bound to pay the amount of them. The Bank resisted the claim, on the ground that it could not be made to pay notes which had been entirely consumed, and of the destruction of which it had not sufficient proof; and that, as to the fragments of notes produced, it could not be made to pay on them either, inasmuch as they bore neither figures nor marks of any kind to prove their identity. The tribunal dismissed the action with costs.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

THE WAR WITH CHINA.

A despatch from Constantinople, dated yesterday, with the following intelligence, appears in the Times of Friday:—

ALEXANDRIA, JAN. 15

The Calcutta steamer has arrived at Suez with advices from Hongkong to the 1st of December.

Yeh, backed up by the gentry and people, continued obdurate.

The French Folly Fort had been taken and destroyed. The Chinese had set fire to the factories, and all the Joss houses were destroyed. The Oriental, Agra, and Mercantile Banks were on fire, with no hopes of saving them.

One fatal accident had occurred, O. T. Lane, nephew of Sir J. Bowring, being killed by the falling in of a wall.

It was said that the city of Canton would no longer be spared, and that the discharge of rockets and shells had already commenced

THE EXPEDITION TO THE PERSIAN GULF.

We have received from Trieste, by way of Vienna, the following despatch:—

The Lloyd steamer arrived this evening at Trieste with the following news:—"The British fleet has taken possession of the fort of Bushire and the island of Karrak."

Rev. A. T. Lee to Bisson, near Gosport.

CONFIRMATION AND CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP OF RIPON.—On Saturday morning the confirmation of the Right Rev. Dr. Bickersteth, the newly appointed Bishop of Ripon, took place in York Cathedral, immediately after the morning service. On Sunday the right rev. Prelate was consecrated in the parish church of Bishopsthorpe, during the celebration of the morning service, which began at eleven o'clock. The Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Manchester, and the Bishop of Carlisle, were present at the ceremony. The sermon was preached by the Hon and Rev. J. T. Pelham, B.A., Honorary Canon of Norwich, Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, and Rector of St. Marylebone, London.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

NOTWITHSTANDING that the demand for accommodation has been less active this week the Discount Market has been very firm. The private bankers, almost generally, have made very cautious advances; and the lowest rate for money in Lombard-street is 5½ per cent. In some quarters there is a growing conviction that we shall have even higher rates, and the news from India and China has rather increased than lessened that impression. The demand for silver has certainly improved, and the price has advanced 2d. per ounce; but, if our advices are to be relied upon, it would appear that the late heavy remittances of silver to India have gone far to adjust the balance of trade against this country. Besides which, it is stated that the principal portion of the season's produce had been shipped, and that the last quotation at Canton was 7s. 2d. With all this, however, we have had almost daily withdrawals of gold from the Bank of England to purchase silver on the Continent, and these withdrawals have, as might be expected, considerably influenced upon the Money Market. The last packet for India took out £367,327, almost wholly in silver; and we find that large parcels continue to be sent to India via the Cape. The large quantities of gold, about £600,000, received from Ireland this week have run upon some of the branches of the National Bank, are gradually finding their way back again to London.

Several of the joint-stock banking companies have held their usual half-yearly meetings this week. The accounts presented have been of a highly-favourable nature. The profits of the London and Westminster, last year, were £30,363 5s. 9d. The City Bank has declared a dividend of 5 and the Union Bank of Australia one of 20 per cent, both free of income-tax.

Owing to some rather heavy sales of money-stock, the Consol Market ruled flat on Monday and prices were rather drooping. The Three per Cents Reduced marked 93⅞ ⅞; the Three per Cent Consols, for Money, 93⅞ ⅞; Ditto, for Account, 93⅞ ⅞; the New Three per Cents, 93⅞ ⅞; New Two-and-a-Half per Cents, —; India Bonds, 2s. dis.; Exchequer Bills, 2s. dis. to 2s. prem.; Exchequer Bonds, 98⅞ 99. Bank Stock was 218, 216; and India Stock, 220. On Tuesday the business doing was limited, as follows:—Bank Stock, 217½; Three per Cents Reduced, 93⅞ ⅞; Consols, for transfer, 93⅞ ⅞; New Three per Cents, 93⅞ ⅞; Long Annuities, 1860, 2⅞; Ditto, 1885, 18 1-16; India Bonds, 2s. dis. to 2s. prem.; Exchequer Bills, 1s. dis. to 2s. prem.; Ditto Bonds, 98⅞. The dealings on Wednesday were trifling, but without anything to any material extent in the quotations. Bank Stock was done at 216, 217½; India Stock, 220. The Reduced Three per Cents were 93⅞ ⅞; Consols, 93⅞ ⅞; Ditto, for Account, 93⅞; New Three per Cents, 93⅞ ⅞; Exchequer Bills, 2s. dis. to 2s. prem.; Ditto Bonds, 98⅞. On Thursday the Directors of the Bank of England made no change in the rate of discount. In the early part of the day the Consol Market was very quiet, and the Three per Cents opened at 93⅞ ⅞. The demand for Stock subsequently improved, and the closing price for Money was 93⅞ ⅞; for Account, 93⅞. The New Three per Cents marked 93⅞ ⅞. The Reduced, 93⅞ to 93⅞; Long Annuities, 2; the Thirty Years', 2 9-16 to ⅝. Bank Stock was heavy, at 216; and India Stock, 220. Exchequer Bills were 1s. dis. to 2s. prem.; and the Bonds, 98⅞ to 99⅛. No important change occurred in reference to the Bank of France. It carried out, they promise to afford great relief to the mercantile classes. The Bank Charter will expire in 1858; and it is now proposed to renew it till 1900, and to increase its capital from 91,000,000 francs to 200,000,000 francs. Very little doubt is entertained in the City but that the project will be carried out, and that no difficulty will be experienced in obtaining the increased capital, the whole of which will, no doubt, be speedily employed.

The Committee of the Stock Exchange have resolved to admit into the official lists the shares of the Australasian Steam Navigation Company. This decision has given much satisfaction to parties immediately interested in mining operations.

There has been a moderate demand for Joint-Stock Bank Shares, and prices generally have been well supported. Australasia have been 85½; Bank of Egypt, 18⅝; Chartered of India, China, and Australia, 53½; City, 39; English, Scottish, and Australian, 19⅝; London Chartered of Australia, 18⅜; Ditto, New, 17⅜; London and County, 33; Oriental, 38⅜; Provincial of Ireland, 69; Ditto, New, 23⅜; Union of Australia, 54½; Ditto, New, 23.

In Miscellaneous Securities only a limited business has been passing. London Dock, 101 ex div.; Victoria, New, 13½; Australian Royal Mail, 8½; Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Six per Cents, 101; Crystal Palace, 2½; Ditto, Preference, 5⅝; Electric Telegraph, 9½; London Omnibus, 3⅜; Peel River Land and Mineral, 3⅝; Scottish Australian Investment, 1⅜; South Australian Land, 37 ex div.; South Australian Government Six per Cent Bonds, 105.

Most Foreign Bonds have been dull, yet we have no important change to notice in the quotations. Brazilian Five per Cents have realised 101; Buenos Ayres Six per Cents, 83½; Chilian Six per Cents, 104; Ecuador, New Consolidated, 14½; Guatemala Five per Cents, 80; Mexican Three per Cents, 21; Spanish Passive, 5¼; Deferred, 21; Portuguese Four per Cents, 34; Ditto, Committee's Certificate of Coupon, 6 per cent; Turkish Six per Cents, 95; Turkish Four per Cents, 103; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 56; Danish Deferred, 68; Peruvian Four per Cents, 74½; Ditto Charit

THE LONDON ARMOURY COMPANY (Limited), Wholesale Manufacturers of Fire-arms to the Trade and her Majesty's War Department, sole manufacturers of Adams' Patent Revolving Barrmondoor Adams' Patent Revolver Pistols, by recent improvements now combines the following advantages

1st. It can be half cocked for safety in loading, and full cock is as to take a deliberate aim

2nd. The five chambers can be discharged in rapid succession without cocking, by merely pulling the trigger, which has been found essential in close contests at Delhi

3rd The new safety bolt fixes the cylinder so as to render an accidental explosion impossible, even if fully cocked and loaded

4th The new comb-lever rod gives great facilities in loading, and prevents the possibility of the charge moving from jolting in belong of the rod

These improvements have rendered the weapon so perfect that it is now exclusively adopted in the British War Department.

To be obtained through any respectable Gunmaker in London, and in the principal towns in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Price-lists and descriptive of fire-arms will be forwarded on applica ion to

STATUES OF THE EARL OF CHATHAM AND CHARLES JAMES FOX.

THE embellishment of St. Stephen's Hall -the great central vestibule to the Houses of Parliament—with statues of illustrious British statesmen, proceeds well; and let us hope that, from the contemplation of these speaking impersonations of the bright lights of a past age, the senators of our own time may become inspired with emulation of the patriotism and public virtues of their predecessors.

Two statues have just been added -the great Earl of Chatham, and the Right Hon. C. J. Fox. The figure of Chatham is by Mr. Macdowell: the statesman is represented in his robes, and speaking; the right hand raised, and the right leg thrown back. The face is thoughtful and expressive, reminding us of the justice of the remark that his eloquence—of the immediate effect of which there is no question must have partaken very much of the only half-intellectual art of acting, and been indebted for his power to his voice, and other mere external advantages, as much as to any higher qualities Such was the orator and the statesman who for more than forty years filled so large a space in the public eye, and whose memory was associated with so much of popular principle and national glory. Mr. Macdowell has happily expressed the high-minded bearing of the great statesman.

The Statue of Charles James Fox is by Mr. Baily, R.A. The bulky proportions of this celebrated statesman seem not to harmonise with the rest of the figures now being placed in St. Stephen's Hall. We cannot help thinking that, had the figure been placed in a quiescent attitude instead of the present denouncing one, more effect would have been gained, and a clumsiness lost which now pervades the statue. It is evidently a characteristic portrait. One hand is raised, whilst the other is placed behind. He wears the square skirted coat, buttoned close upon the chest by one button—a style with which we are familiar, from the various portraits executed at the period in which Fox lived. There is little philosophic expression in this portraiture; the sculptor having rather impersonated Sir James Mackintosh's characteristics of Fox as an orator—that "he possessed above all moderns that union of reason, simplicity, and vehemence which formed the prince of orators. He was the most Demosthenean speaker since the days of Demosthenes."

SKETCHES IN AUSTRALIA.

THE ABORIGINES OF AUSTRALIA.

THE natives of Australia are fast disappearing, through the ravages of intoxication and disease, combined with occasional warfare, and but a few years more will suffice for the now scanty population to become extinct. About twenty years since, the Surveyor, General Mitchell, estimated that in about one-seventh of the whole colony which he had examined, the natives did not exceed 6000 in number. They lead a wandering, vagabond life, hanging about the houses of the settlers, where they are well treated. Their habitations are merely temporary shelters, often formed of boughs and bark piled up against the stump of a tree, rather to shelter them from the wind than to serve as a regular habitation, for they have a superstitious objection to encamping on one spot three nights in succession.

Meanwhile travellers from our colonies who visit the interior to witness these evanescent scenes of aboriginal life fill their sketch-books with portraits and characteristics of these very interesting people; and by this means we are enabled to present these scenes of savage life side by side with many a splendid picture of the refinement of civilised society. To the former class of Illustrations belong the two accompanying representations of life in the forests of Australia.

First is one of the methods by which the natives climb trees, with a facility, fearlessness, and dexterity which are well worthy of note. They employ two different methods of ascent—one with a tomahawk, and the other by the assistance of a vine, which is used as a rope or hoop. The former method is most generally practised. The native, having eyed well the inclination of the tree, commences by cutting a notch just large enough to admit his great toe. The height of this notch from the ground is about 2½ feet, although it generally depends upon the individual, for it is a remarkable fact that two natives will not ascend by each others' notches, or steps, even though the tree has been climbed by several of them. He then cuts another notch, from two to three feet higher, for his left foot; and when this is done he fixes his tomahawk as high as he can reach into the tree, and, holding by it, ascends the two first notches. His left great toe being in the second cut, he stands, supporting his whole weight upon it, with his left arm round the tree, and then makes two more notches as before. In this manner the natives get up immense trees, rising from 40 to 50 feet without a branch, with as much confidence and celerity as a European mounts a ladder.

MODE OF CLIMBING A TREE.

Among the customs of the native Australians their disposal of the dead is not the least interesting. Certain tribes, when the head of a family dies, lay the body out on a framework of sticks, raised a foot from the ground, and there suffered to rot. The nearest relative watches it in a hut near the corpse until the head drops off, when that member is handed over to the charge of the dead man's wife, who carries it about with her in a bag during her widowhood. The accompanying Sketch, by a Correspondent, illustrates a somewhat different mode of procedure. In this scene the corpse is placed on a platform of wickerwork, attached to poles, and raised to a considerable height above the ground, so as to prevent the native dogs (a species which resembles a mixture of the wolf and jackal) from getting at the body, and devouring it, which they would do if the ordinary mode of depositing it in the earth were observed. A superstition prevails among the native tribes which dictates this proceeding. They believe that if a dead Indian be placed under the ground, and be exhumed, the soul will animate the body of a white person. This, in their estimation, is an evil to be deprecated and avoided, for which purpose the above precaution is adopted. It should be observed that the vultures which are seen descending on the corpse are regarded as no good." Even Malays, Chinamen, and the natives of India, he counted as nothing in his increasing admiration of Europeans, until he saw some sepoys, when he altered his opinion a little, and thought that he, too, if only big enough, would like to be a soldier. The poor fellow suffered much from cold during the passage round Cape Leeuwin, and was ill when landed at Sydney, but soon recovered. Although his thoughts were always centered in his native home, and a girl to whom he was much attached, he yet volunteered to accompany me to England when the Fly was about to sail; but as I had then no immediate prospect of returning to Australia, I could not undertake the responsibility of having to provide for him for the future. I was glad then when Lieut. Yule, who was about to revisit Port Essington, generously offered to take him there. While in the Bramble he made himself useful in assisting the steward, and, under the tuition of Dr MacGlatchie, made some proficiency in acquiring the rudiments of reading and writing.

ABORIGINAL MODE OF THE DISPOSAL OF THE DEAD IN AUSTRALIA.

HOW THE WEST-END LOOKS THIS WINTER.

I HAVE two sisters. and I am not ashamed to say they are very nice girls. They read me to sleep after dinner from the pages of my favourite author. They embroider as many slippers and braces for me as if I were a popular clergyman. They behave very handsomely to me in regard to my favourite vice, permitting me to smoke with my study-door open, and encouraging me to light my cigar when we happen to walk home late from an evening party. If I happen to dance with a charming partner, and talk about her at breakfast next morning, they leave cards, and soon ascertain everything I want to know. When Emily Purvis was forced by her friends to marry that rich West Indian I had, as you may be sure, a terrible heartache, and then the darlings, without appearing to notice my concern, had a thousand little winning ways and noiseless attentions to divert my thoughts. They have given up Herz and Liszt, although good executants, because I like Mozart and Mendelssohn, and they take especial care that none of the popular sentimental songs of the day find their way to their pianos until they are well assured of their merit. These are great virtues in sisters, you will say. I could not give you half so long a catalogue of my good offices I render in return. Like most brothers, I fear I accept their kindness in a gruff, condescending way, as homage from an inferior to a superior being. In fact, I can't think of anything I do for them. Oh! yes. I sometimes take them shopping

Augusta and Lucy are handsome presentable girls, with a liberal allowance of pocket money, and they have not unfrequently, therefore, a little shopping to do on their own account. They are held by their friends to hit that golden mean of always being well dressed, and yet never buying a bonnet or a robe which can fairly be considered extravagant or unnecessary. It is astonishing how far a few judicious purchases go when taste presides over the selection. My sisters, too, although they always seem fashionably attired, yet in truth only borrow just so much of the prevailing mode as suits their style, complexion, and features. Augusta's forte is colour—its harmonies and contrasts, while Lucy loves to trace the artist in a graceful design. They have, of course, their little differences. Augusta, for example, admires many of the Scotch plaids, and pretends that they give us gay, cheerful, and pretty intermixtures of colour; while Lucy declares that the prevalence of plaids shows great poverty of design on the part of the artists, and want of taste on the part of the public. She demands play of line, running patterns, scrolls, arabesques, floral wreaths. I have not the smallest idea which is right, nor would I on any account be thought to have an opinion on the subject. But I see clearly enough that Augusta's infallible judgment of colour, and Lucy's taste in design, make them invaluable London correspondents; and I do not wonder that they have always a dozen commissions on hand to buy every thing new and pretty for some country friend or other.

Augusta's schoolfellow and bosom-friend, Mrs. Carcajou, wife of an elderly gentleman high in the East India Company's service, is the leader of fashion in the capital of one of our Indian Presidencies. Her letters (which I refuse to read on principle, as they are always crossed) are full of notes of exclamation and italics, descriptive of the lovely bonnets and enchanting silks and satins that her dear, kind Augusta has been good enough to send her. Her happiness is furthermore rendered complete by the circumstance that every other lady in the Presidency is dying with envy and curiosity to know how it happens that Mrs. Carcajou's toilet is always so exquisitely becoming that not a tint is out of harmony, and that the tone is so quiet yet so decidedly lady-like. Carcajou, to do him justice, is proud of his wife, and quarrels with her because her milliner's bills are so small. He has sent Augusta and Lucy two or three Indian shawls, such as you see nowhere but in the windows of Graham's, on Ludgate-hill, or at Howell and James's - like that magnificent shawl of green and gold which the beautiful Duchess of Wellington wore at the marriage of her sister with Sir Robert Peel. A Duchess may wear such a shawl two or three times in her life, but for other people a similar present is about as useful as a white elephant. One of old Carcajou's packages contained a superb set of ivory chessmen for me; and his wife's letters, if Augusta reads them aright, always end with a postscript of remembrance and thanks to "dear patient Phil." These kind friendly recollections take their rise from a little controversy between the girls at Harding's, in Pall-mall. They were selecting a robe for Mrs. Carcajou. Augusta's eye had been taken by a moiré-antique, of imperial magnificence, and with a rich yet soft and delicate hue. Lucy, on the contrary, voted for a French chéné silk, with a pattern of rosebuds, so exquisitely designed that they appeared to have been painted upon the fabric. A true artist had been there, and the eye was never weary of admiring his work. The dear things were longer than usual in making up their minds. The opposing theories had to be reconciled; and yet even the semblance of a dispute before the shopman was not to be thought of. "I think we must consider about it, and let you know to-morrow which we will have," said Augusta. All at once an idea struck her. "What do you say, Phil, dear?" said she. It was the first time they had ever thought of consulting me. I was known to be stupid and unobservant, which I heartily believe I am, with no qualification for going shopping, except perhaps being patient and silent. If I had not been thrown off my guard I should have replied, "Settle it between you;" but, being taken by the surprise by the suddenness of the appeal, I said, "Take them both!" "Capital, Phil, dear!" they exclaimed in a breath. The robes were sent, and the occasion was thought to demand a detailed statement of the pros and cons, and Phil's suggestion. The next mail brought Augusta a long letter, three times crossed. Mrs. Carcajou did not know which robe most to admire. Society was divided in that part of our Indian empire upon the merits of the two dresses. Persons of taste took opposite sides, as Augusta and Lucy had done, and a coolness had sprung up between intimate friends in consequence. To think that she owed such delightful results and two such robes to dear Philip's presence of mind and good taste, filled her with gratitude. Augusta declared that Di Carcajou commissioned her to give me a kiss, and that the message bore her husband's initials in the corner, with the words "seen and approved" in his handwriting; but this I always treated as a joke of Augusta's. The chessmen followed. Like the cashmeres, they are too valuable and beautiful for use. So they stand under a glass shade in the drawing-room, of which they are one of the chief ornaments. Of course I took measures to prevent my opinion from being drawn into a precedent. I am allowed to look on, in utter vacuity of mind, upon their purchases, and it is only in the gravest cases and after profound apologies that I permit myself to be spoken to. I think about anything or about nothing, as the case may be, while lustres, barèges, and all the fabrics of the loom, pass before my eyes.

The girls have friendly commissions to execute from two or three acquaintances in the provinces, as well as for Mrs. Carcajou. They like shopping. They have a vocation for it. It is their passion. The only thing that makes it tolerable to me is that they do it out of hand. Like all people of taste they know exactly what they want, and fix upon it by an instinct. Ladies who ponder over each robe as it is shown, and who detain an assistant an hour before they can make up their minds, may seriously distrust their taste. Augusta and Lucylike to look in at the shop windows. They wish, indeed, that shops were vast bazaars, in which the wares could be hung up and seen without the trouble of being unrolled. Shopping then would consist in a hurried walk round a large edifice, and in pointing to a dress. They will only be waited upon by a particular assistant at each establishment, who knows their style, and who, above all, loses no unnecessary time in displaying his silks and satins. An inferior artist dwells upon his ugliest patterns, praises their cheapness, tears out duplicates, and is never satisfied till the girls throw out that their time is limited, and that he cannot pass from one article to another too quickly. Three or four patterns of striking merit having been illuminated, the real difficulty of selection begins when these are brought together and compared. But the decision is not long; and when two pieces of stuff of distracting beauty and elegance puzzle my sisters, they exclaim, "Phil's choice!" and take them both

I am a little ashamed of writing about dresses and patterns, and how the shop-windows at the West-end looked on New Year's-day The fact is, as my lady readers will soon discover, I know very little about the matter. The dear girls on each side of me interchange remarks, and I shall try and repeat them, like a parrot. If Augusta, now, would only send you one of her letters to Di Carcajou what a vivid picture you would have of Regent-street and Bond-street! The scarlets that make the streets so gay this season would glow under her pen. The fashionable bonnet of scarlet and black, the scarlet bonnet-ribbons, the gay Lindsays of scarlet and black stripes which continually flash in view and attract attention to a neatly-fitting, high heeled, Balmoral boot, give animation to our thoroughfares. We (that is Augusta and Lucy) like scarlet as a winter colour. It is warm, bright, and cheerful. Light blues and greens, on the contrary, have a chilly look; and have been known to give an elderly bachelor a twinge of rheumatism when encountered suddenly on a cold day. The worst of it is that scarlet does not suit every complexion. It may be said, indeed, on the contrary, that there are very few ladies who can bear it in close proximity to their pretty cheeks. One class, however, of her Majesty's subjects at present live upon mutton, and scarcely seem to touch the ground in walking. The winter scarlets have brought brunettes into fashion. A brunette with a clear complexion, finds her colour heightened by the tints about her face, so that she looks ravishing; while many of her sex who rashly dare the trying ordeal appear pale, sickly, and sallow. Some ladies who know that scarlet is not a becoming tint for them substitute another colour for the trimming inside the bonnet. When you follow them they are seen to wear the prevailing black velvet with scarlet bands; and they are right in the fashion without absolutely sacrificing themselves to the cruel and fickle goddess. Augusta's quick eye is ever on the watch to discover whether these flowers or ribbons harmonise with the scarlet without. We agree that it is in such combinations that the woman of taste is seen; and I am not unfrequently called upon to remark how a delicate rose pink—pretty per se is placed in the most unlawful proximity to the fashionable colour of the season. The bonnet ribbon which comes down streamerwise is another triumph for the brunette and snare for the majority of blondes. Augusta declares that scarlet to match the colour of the bonnet is au régnevy, and will by no means dispense with it if she is called upon to say whether a lady is fashionably dressed. I call this difficulty of consulting the complexion and fashion at the same time "the trials of our Margaret Lindsays;" but no one has yet laughed at this joke, although you will see that it distinctly refers to a certain article of attire which never before looked so gay and attractive. But then people are often so stupid and so ill natured.

We are rather severe upon another characteristic of the winter fashions. A rage for novelty has led the manufacturer, it appears, to insert flounces of one fabric in the body of another. Thus, borders of silk, satin, velvet, fur, or muslin, are often to be found of the gayest colours and patterns in a material with which these fabrics have no agreement or fitness. The result is patchy and unsatisfactory. Yet a gay plaid along the flounce of a sober dress is sometimes approved, and a shawl-pattern border agreeably relieves the monotony of a grey or light-brown stuff. Phil is pleased with the blue French merinoes that have an elegant running-pattern border of black velvet; and several Russian Countesses give their names to robes of chambord which have warm-looking borders of various-coloured furs, some very rich and expensive. Fancy ribbons in a shop-window are always gay; but Augusta declares that the Coventry patterns are this Christmas often hard and inharmonious; and Lucy shakes her head doubtfully at the designs. The pretty lustre ribbons of gold and white, light blue and silver, and gold and violet, glisten in the light, and arrest many a passer. But the grand storehouse of the linendraper is devoted to opera mantles; and here the scarlet judiciously contrasted with white, dazzles the vision, like the bull's-eye of a doctor's shop in the New-road. Let mankind rejoice that these cloaks, in which young ladies look like bewitching Norwood gipsies, still retain the hood for ball-room and theatre. We notice a greater proportion of pure white, and white alone, than heretofore. The bornouse worn by the Arab chief at the State balls during Queen Victoria's visit to Paris last year has been converted into a winter garment for ladies, and is recommended with much variety of orthography, but it has not displaced the better-known hood of the opera mantle

My sisters were at the last Drawingroom, and call upon each other to remark as we pass Jay's Sponsalia, that the bouquets of flowers worn upon the Court dresses are now introduced upon some white muslin ball-dresses with much fanciful decoration of satin bows and quilling. Some beautiful ball-dresses of black lace, with gold embroidery are, no doubt, suitable for the matronly; and other black lace robes have gay reds and crimsons interwoven until they look spotted with dazzling fire-flies. Another ball-dress of white muslin is delicately barred round the flounces with silver basket-work, like the interlacing jets round the edge of the Crystal Palace central fountain. We all agree that the effect thus produced is tasteful and pretty, and one of the best of these gauze-like tissues has been bought for Mrs. Carcajou. Some white silks, with raised horizontal stripes of the same colour are admired and coveted by every one. Young ladies in search of pretty dresses for evening wear are powerfully attracted by light French barèges of delicate hues and white stripes.

Of all the shops, I think those of the artificial flower makers are the gayest. Wreaths and sprays, and some ladies wear a small conservatory in their hair and drooping upon their shoulders. This fashion, no doubt, increases the brilliancy of our ball-rooms. The French designers who devote themselves to this branch of art are, of late years, botanists as well as artists. A Fellow of the Linnean Society would give you the scientific name of every flower in the window, and would, moreover, admire the fidelity of the imitation. Some of the most graceful wreaths are formed by the white orange-like flowers of the Stephanotus floribundus with the snowdrop. The dark green leaves of the holly and ivy, with the red berries of the former, would seem à priori to be suitable for the season, but are scarcely so becoming for evening wear as the exotics. Crimson wreaths are formed by a profusion of the flowers of the fuchsia. Scarlets are represented by the verbena, which is reproduced with the minutest accuracy in the most brilliant colours, with a sufficient intermixture of green leaves to give due relief. The artists have been less successful with the Lilium lancefolium rubrum. The flower is most rich and varied in colour, but the large starlike divisions do not gracefully follow and adapt themselves to the circle of the wreath, and produce a somewhat heavy effect. A disposition may be here and there observed among the artists to take up the plants which are cultivated for the beauty of their foliage rather than for their flowers: such as Cissus bicolor, Caladium bicolor, and Maranta zebrina. Plants of this family are now the fashion, and the imitations of some of these leaves are remarkable for softness and richness of shading.

With all these attractions of colour the shops at the West-end, in the present January, put on an air of unusual gaiety. The streets are filled with happy crowds of mammas in charge of troops of daughters and sons home from school for the holidays, and intent upon pudding and pantomime. The first quarter of a mile of Oxford-street eastward of Regent-circus is now, about two p.m., a fashionable promenade—the shopping-ground of English beauty. I think I like, for reasons, to see the world as much as possible enrolled in this direction; but I distinctly deny being in the least degree interested in their shopping, and I hope you will preserve my secret at the club. Imagine Marmaduke Fitzwygram and Jack Temple in the smoking-room at Doodle's, with a copy of your favourite newspaper, and myself extended upon ottoman before them—the proved author of this paper—a delinquent critical in scarlet kirtles, and talking the argot of a milliner's show-room! I should never hear the last of it. The contemplation of such an annoyance almost leads me to declare that I will never take my sisters shopping again.

ON INTERNATIONAL AND INTERVENTION.

TAKING then Municipal Law for a guide, what inferences can be drawn on the subject of a wider Public Law or Law of Nations?

All collections of men, from the most barbarous upwards, form themselves into something pointing to nationalities. The races in India who are understood to make nests in a tree, doubtless attach an idea of something like nationality to the tree they hold in common. If assault were made on the nests on one side of it, the dwellers on the other would rush out "with angry fyke," on the same principle that bees resent an attack on one portion of their republic. What the form of government in these human nests may be, historians have not told; but in all the forms, from this to the fierce despotisms of barbarous ages and the gentler institutions of more civilised periods, the reasoning unit, man, like a globule of quicksilver, has always exhibited a tendency to rush into combination with other globules, for the sake of what he thinks the good arising.

Is this, then, as it ought to be, or ought there to be something else? Would it be for good, for instance, that any existing society in Europe should resolve itself into tree life; and not only that, but, as the principle would manifestly require, should each man occupy a tree as far as possible from neighbours, and so approximate to the life of hawks and buzzards, in preference to that of the gregarious fowl?

This sounds ridiculous; but the ridicule reverts on those who, though perhaps not propounding it in distinct terms, sneer at the phrases "nationality" and "international," as if they pointed to some state of things which mankind could not only do without, but which if they were wise they would proceed to abolish by the quickest means.

If then the existence of nationalities may be treated as defensible, is there any reason why compacts of the same nature should not exist among nations, as exist among individuals in a single nation; and may not one be taken as an example for the other? The question would be childish, if it were not that men of no small standing are found virtually proclaiming that all that men have done and will do in this way is wrong; that the true way would be to sit down and see what heaven would send you, —withdraw ambassadors as a vain attempt to interfere with heaven,—study history to see how superior our condition would have been at the present day, if all our predecessors ever did under the name of statesmanship could have been nullified or reversed,—calculate the expense and misery which have been incurred in pretended leagues to resist what was fancied to be a common enemy,—and see how much better it would have been if everything had been left to take its way, as sensible men know to be the proper course in all human affairs. Look at men calling themselves statesmen, incurring a national debt a hundred and sixty years ago which lasts till now, for no reason but to prevent a continental king from pleasing himself, first at Amsterdam and then at St. James's. Would not he have been, as waiting-women say, "near so long" before he had got all that way; and would not the comforts enjoyed by quiet citizens in the interim have overbalanced any pretended good that has come to anybody? Would Louis Quatorze have seriously damaged anything? Should we have been much the worse for the Spanish Armada? Should not, by the necessity which experience shows to exist, everything have come right in the end? Does it not always do so? Does not everything prove that man's wisdom is folly? Do not haystacks sailing before the wind, come into port when your trim barks are wrecked? Will man never learn to be quiet, and to eat his present pudding and hold his tongue?

If anybody thinks this too sweeping, it is because there has been sweeping on the other side. The representation of the adversary has not been that in one place statesmen were mistaken, and in another maliciously wrong. But it has amounted, though not perhaps in distinct terms, to inculcating that man has all along been in error in thinking there was such a thing as statesmanship at all;—that true statesmanship would be in letting everything alone, as true steersmanship consists in tying up the helm, and leaving everything to the Providence which is sure to have its way in the end.

The answer to all this is, that Providence works by human means, and if steersmen have not steered aright, they should learn, and not throw up their vocation as Providence never asked them.

Perhaps this may clear the road for a point-by-point examination of the ways in which National Law does or might copy from Municipal. It will be something to have got rid of the notion that the thing treated of is a folly altogether.

THEATRICAL COPYRIGHT.—At the Bloomsbury County Court, on Friday, the 16th inst., Mr. Heath, the judge, gave judgment in the case of "Planché v. James," in which a case of some importance to the theatrical profession was raised. The plaintiff is the well-known dramatic writer, and brought an action against Mr. James, the lessee of the Queen's Theatre, Tottenham-street, to recover a penalty of 40*s.* for a performance of a farce, called "A Pleasant Neighbour," under the Act 3rd of William IV., chap. 15. The cause was tried in December, and the defence was that at the time of the representation the theatre was let to Mr. George Bolton, and that he was, consequently, liable. In answer, Mr. Lewis (Lewis and Lewis, as solicitors to the Dramatic Authors' Society, submitted that, under the Act regulating theatres (6th and 7th of Victoria, chap. 68) the license of the Lord Chamberlain was to Mr. James, and that for the protection of the public he was the person liable for all matters connected with the theatre, and that, although the theatre was let, he would be bound to obey any interdiction from the Lord Chamberlain. By the 7th section of the Act the license could only be granted to the "actual and responsable manager for the time being of the theatre." The judge took time to consider, and now said he was clearly of opinion that the defendant was liable. He thought so at the time; but, as the matter was of some importance, he did not wish hastily to decide it. Judgment was given for the plaintiff for a penalty of 40*s.* and costs. In the Act 3rd of William IV., chap. 15) the costs are specified as "costs of suit."

THE RUSSIAN POST-OFFICE.—The Mémorial National of St. Petersburg gives the following details of the Post office establishments in Russia: "In 1825 there were only 603 offices in the country; now the number is upwards of 750. The extent of ground run over by the mail conveyances was in 1825 only 10,000,000 of versts, the verst is little more than five-eighths of a mile; in 1855 that extent had increased to 18,000,000. There are now, throughout all the empire, regularly-organised roads for the post, with 3950 stations for relays, and a staff of 15 510 employés. At the stations there are kept 50,000 horses, 432 reindeer, 1810 dogs, and 680 boats and barges. In 1825, the number of private letters conveyed was 5,000,000; in 1835, 6,000,000; in 1840, 8,000,000; in 1845 10,000,000; and in 1850, 12,000,000. The number of letters and packets sent by the Crown exceeds the above. In this number are included all packets sent under the Government seal, and in this category are comprised journals, reviews, and correspondence of learned societies."

UNPUBLISHED LETTER OF ARCHBISHOP LAUD.

THE following very interesting letter of Archbishop Laud, which was formerly in possession of the Duke of Sussex, and is intended to appear in the sixth volume of "Laud's Works in the Anglo-Catholic Library," we owe to the courtesy of the Editor, the Rev. James Bliss

TO THE LORD VISCOUNT SCUDAMORE.

My very good Lord I am glad to see by your letters that you are returned safe to your own home, where, God bless you, your lady, and your son with health. I remember you told me when you were lately here, you thought your sister's business would bring you to London again in Easter Term; if it do I shall be very glad to see you, and though I have little leisure left me, yet I shall find enough, I hope, to give you as many turns in my Stone Gallery, if you have any occasion to see me, as I did at your late being here; for which your company and kindness I thank you heartily.

About a week before I received your Lordship's letters, I had a letter sent me from the party whose long sickness you gave me such an account of as you can; and though Mr. Parry expressed little to you, yet I doubt I can give a shrewd guess at his disease; not that he hath expressed in his letters anything to me, but all that I guess is by some expressions upon the by: and truly, my Lord, if I mistake not, all his disease is discontent; but for what is nowhere expressed; but if I collect right, it is for that which I cannot remedy; and which, were I as pettish as some men are, would give me just cause of offence. For your Lordship knows—no man better—how ready I was, when you were in treaty for him for the Chancellorship of Gloucester, to do him all the favour, and give him all the assistance, I could. Besides, you know how careful I was to fit him nearer you then so, by all my endeavours for Hereford, till it appeared plainly that no good could be done that way. Since that I would have given him (and your Lordship knows that too) a Principality of a Hall in Oxford, had not his necessary attendance upon you made him incapable of it, which I could not say attendance upon you made him incapable of it, which I could not say. Yet he writes that he is almost obliterated out of my memory. Your Lordship shall take no notice of this; but it is not well. Perhaps he thinks I might in all this space have given him some such place in mine own gift: but he would have done very well before he had drunk in his discontent, to have asked me whether any such place had fallen void or no; and I would have answered him as truly as easily, that I was never yet so happy as to have any such place to give. And for those which are now in my power, they are for the greatest and ablest lawyers in the kingdom, if ever they should fall void in my lifetime—which I know not whether they will or not. I am willing to give your Lordship this large account, that you may see how little cause I have given of discontent. And if that which I cannot do, or not do with my credit, be thus expected from me, it will make me shrink up indeed, and not lie so open to my friends as I have done. So in haste I leave your Lordship to the grace of God, over resting your Lordship's loving friend to serve you.

W. CANT.

Lambeth, MARCH 29, 1634.

NOTES.

CURIOUS CUSTOMS.—The following curious old customs and ancient grants of land form the MS. additions made by Mr. Douce in a copy of Beckwith's edition of "Blount's Fragmenta Antiquitatis," &c., which is now among his collection in the Bodleian Library:

In the custom roll of Westhall Manor, in Norfolk, made in Sir John de Gatesbarow's time, this peculiar custom is entered, that every tenant of that manor that marries out of the homage, is obliged to pay the Lord a bed, bolster, sheet, and pillow. This was constantly observed, and there are abundance of entries in the rolls of such payments. And in Richard II.'s time the bed was mounted, by the Lord's kindness, though the rest were paid in Queen Elizabeth's time, or a composition for them.

The manor of Broughton, in Lincolnshire, is held of the Lord of the manor of Castor, or of Harden, a hamlet in the parish of Castor, by the following service:—On Palm-Sunday a person from Broughton attends with a new cart-whip, or whip-pad (as they call it in Lincolnshire), made in a peculiar manner, and, after cracking it three times in the church porch, marches with it upon his shoulder through the middle aisle into the choir, where he takes his place in the lord of the manor's seat. There he remains till the minister comes to the second lesson; he then quits the seat with his pad, having a purse that ought to contain thirty silver pennies (for which, however, of late years, half-a-crown has been substituted) fixed to the end of his lash, and kneeling down on a cushion, or mat, before the reading-desk, he holds the purse suspended over the minister's head all the time he is reading this second lesson; after which he returns to his seat. The whip and purse are left at the manor-house. Some ingenious persons have devised a reason for every circumstance of this ceremony. They suppose that the thirty pennies are to be a sign by the thirty pieces of silver mentioned in the second lesson, which Judas received to betray Jesus Christ; that the three cracks of the whip, in the porch, allude to Peter's denying his Lord three times, &c.

At Okeham the Lord of the Manor has the privilege of unshoeing every horse that passes through the manor. Every one passing through Okeham must unshoe his horse, or pay a forfeit. On the Town-house many horse-shoes are nailed, and over the Mayor's gate is one 6½ feet long.—BERKENNEYER, I, p. 130.

In Domesday Book survey, taken in the year 1086, Shrewsbury is styled a city; and it is enacted that, whenever the King chooseth to lay here, twelve of the best citizens shall sit up and guard him; and the like number shall attend him with horse and arms whenever he goeth a hunting.

Every woman marrying is to pay the King—if a widow, twenty shillings; if a maid, ten shillings. Every burgess whose house shall be burnt down forfeits to the King forty shillings, and to his two next neighbours ten shillings each. Every burgess dying, his executors were to pay ten shillings to the King.

SHAKSPEARE AND BACON.—Agreeing entirely, as I think any person pretending to form an opinion must, in your view of the Shakspeare and Bacon question, I would offer one remark or two upon points which would appear to bear somewhat materially on the discussion. It is pretty generally admitted that Shakspeare was not a man of profound erudition, and that the astonishing reader of the human heart had little reading in other respects. On the other hand, Lord Bacon, the illustrious philosopher and finished scholar, may fairly be assumed to have had an immense portion of all the knowledge of the age at his command. Now, can any man of ordinary sense believe that Lord Bacon would have caused a vessel to suffer shipwreck on the coast of Bohemia, or have woven the machinery of our purely Teutonic friends Puck, Titania, and Oberon into a "Tale of Athens in the days of Theseus"? But, in addition to these instances of an imperfectly informed though gigantic intellect, which in a "poor player" we may pass without much censure, Shakspeare makes a thousand blunders which would be as monstrous and inexplicable in a man of learning as it would be were my Lord Brougham to write a Highland tragedy, scene laid at Inverness, and bring in Mars, Venus, Apollo, and Momus as a portion of the dramatis personæ. I need only instance the thundering guns which celebrate the carouse of Hamlet's uncle; Richard the Third (a boy of twelve or thirteen) murdering our sixth Harry in the Tower; Austria and France cannonading into each other's mouths at the siege of Anger; with a multitude of similar blunders and anachronisms pardonable in busy, impulsive, half-educated glorious Will, but which I maintain no man possessed of one quarter of the great bacon's learning could, by any possibility, have committed.—R. M. P., Union Club.

SINAITIC INSCRIPTIONS.—M. LOTTIN DE LAVAL IN THE PENINSULA OF SINAI.—All the world, from the Edinburgh Review downwards, have been kept waiting for Laval's work. It is out, and how does it like it? I mean to be fairly taken your guesses. These valuable records so very skilfully made by Laval, by order of the French Government—are worthy of the serious study of those who are interested in the subject.—W. J. D.

SHAKSPEARE CUP.—Among the objects of interest at the sale of Mr. Berry's library, which was disposed of by Messrs Sotheby and Wilkinson, last week, besides some folio and quarto Shakspeares was the identical cup, made from a portion of the mulberry-tree planted by Shakspeare, and, that was used by Garrick at the celebration of the Shakspeare Jubilee at Drury Lane, in 1769. This interesting relic was in the possession of the well-known Thomas Hill (Paul Pry Hill) for nearly half a century; at the sale of his property it was bought by the late Mr. Jolly, and at his death it was purchased by Mr. Berry for thirty guineas. At the sale last week, after a spirited competition, it was knocked down for £50. The four folios of Shakspeare—viz., those of 1623, 1632, 1663, and 1685—fetched respectively £47, £8 12s., £16, and £6 18s. As may be supposed from the prices realised, they were anything but choice copies. The six volumes of Mr. Halliwell's magnificent folio edition of Shakespeare, with right to the future volumes free, fetched £53, an advance of above £10 on the original subscription. The quarto edition of "A Midsommer Night's Dreame," as it hath some sundry times publickly acted by the Right Honourable the Lord Chamberlaine his servants (1600)," was bought by Mr. Daniel for £20.

ANCIENT COSTUME.—The following curious cutting from an antique tome may not be entirely inapplicable to the present day, when the pride of dress, extravagance, and luxury keep double quick time with their opportunities (not always honest ones!) of indulgence. Let a "Boke" intituled "Eulogium," tempus King Edward the Third, read the March of Intellect a lesson:

The Commons were besotted in excess of apparel; in wide surcoats reaching to their loins; sone in a garment reaching to their heels, close before, and strutting out at the sides, so that on the back they make men seem women, and this they call by a ridiculous name Gown. Their hoods are little, tyed under the chin, and buttoned like the women's: but act with gold, silver, and precious stones. Their Lyrippipes reach to their heels, all jagged. They have another Weed of silke which they call a Falock. Their Hose are of two Colours, or Pied with more: which with Latchets, they call Herlots, they tie to their Paltocks without any Breeches. Their girdles are of gold and silver; some worth 20 marks; their shoes and patterns are snowted and piked, more than a finger long, crooking upwards, which they call Crackows, resembling the Devil's claws, which were fastned to the knees with chains of gold and silver; and these were Lyons in the Hall, and Bares in the Field.

GEORGE DANIEL, Canonbury.

QUERIES.

WILL any of our readers or correspondents inform me whether the Boar's Head, which played so important a part at the feasts of our ancestors, was salt, smoked, or fresh, and how it was cooked?

R. M. GRANVILLE.

CAN any of your correspondents give the solution of the following enigma, of which I have been as yet unable to discover either the author or the answer

I sit lone on a rock, whilst I'm raising the wind,
But, the storm once abated, I'm gentle and kind;
I have Kings at my feet, who wait but my nod
To kneel down in the dust, on the ground I have trod:
Though oft seen to the world I'm known but to few,
The Gentiles detest me—I'm pork to the Jew.
I never have passed but one night in the dark,
And that was with Noah, alone in the Ark.
My weight is three pounds, my length is a mile,
And when I'm discovered you'll say with a smile
That my first and my last are the best in the Isle

ANSWERS.

BOSWELL'S LETTERS.—A "Devonshire Rector," in the last number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, says he is unable to trace the Rev. Mr. Temple of his having the Rectory of Mamhead, in Devonshire. This is somewhat singular, as, when first introduced by Boswell to his readers, he is spoken of as the Rev. Mr. Temple, of St. Glurias, in Cornwall. Of this place, which forms part of the borough of Penryn, he became Vicar, and there he died in August, 1796. The Rev. Mr. Temple left two sons: one of whom, Major Temple, died at Sierra Leone, about 1830, after a residence of scarcely twelve months there, as Governor of that settlement, the other son, Vice-Admiral Temple, still lives in the neighbourhood of Truro. The writer of this note was acquainted with his family twenty years ago, and happening, in 1848, to be in the neighborhood of Truro, he called on the Admiral. His family then consisted of two sons and two daughters. Both the sons are now dead; one only a few months since on his passage from the Crimea after the termination of the war. The great interest which the publication of Boswell's Letters has excited will, perhaps, render these few facts concerning the family of his correspondent acceptable to your readers, as well as answer the inquiry of a "Devonshire Rector."—A CORNISHMAN.

"A Devonshire Rector" seemed much outraged at the "blundering writer in an Exeter paper some years since" on the fate of the two Temples, &c., and, as it is in search of facts, he will be equally pleased to be set right himself on the matter of their grave, which he has mis-stated. The Harcourt family lives at Nuneham Park, six miles east of Oxford; their place of sepulture is at Stanton Harcourt, five miles south-west of Oxford; and there, in the churchyard (not in the church), is the grave and record of their death and burial. OXFORD, in residence fifty years.

THE POPE'S TRIPLE CROWN.—The following account of the triple crown is an extract from the Abbé Choisy's "History of Philip de Valois," quoted by the anonymous author of the "Histoire des Papes," under the head of John XXII.:—"He (John XXII.) it was who added a third crown to the pontifical tiara. Originally the head-dress of the Popes was only a cap, a little higher than the caps ordinarily worn, but unlike the Phrygian mitre used in ancient days by the priests of Cybele; but Clovis, King of the Franks, to show his respect to the Church of Rome, which he recognised as the first of all the Christian Churches, sent to the Palace of St. John Lateran a Royal crown of gold, which Anastatius, Emperor of Constantinople, had presented to him. The Pope Hormisdas placed upon the tiara this crown, which was at that time nothing more than a circle of gold surmounted by fleurons; being much such a coronet as is nowadays borne by Marquises in France. The successor of Hormisdas continued to wear the tiara with one crown only up to the time of Boniface VIII., but this Pope having in his discussion with King Philippe le Bel claimed authority over things temporal as well as things spiritual, wished to mark this double dominion even on the pontifical tiara, on which he placed two crowns instead of one. Ultimately Pope John XXII. added a third crown. The three together now form the ornament of the Papal tiara, which the Italians call 'Il regno,' and sometimes 'Il triregno.'" The Abbé Choisy here gives to John XXII. the addition of the third crown, but does not give that Pope's reasons for so doing. If we assume that the third crown, like the second, was meant as a symbol of extended temporal authority, probability would seem to point to John XXII., rather than to Urban V., as the maker of the addition. Urban V. was mainly occupied during his pontificate in building, restoring, and ornamenting churches, in founding and maintaining universities, and encouraging literature; and rather in reforming the internal abuses of the Church than in extending or asserting its temporal dominion; while John XXII., during the greater part of his occupation of the Papal chair, was engaged in active struggles to extend the Papal power by the suppression of the party of the Ghibellines, and in contests against Louis of Bavaria (who set up the Anti-Pope Nicholas V. against him), whose election as Emperor the Pope claimed the right to annul or confirm at his pleasure. John is described as a Pontiff arrogant in character and "of an immoderate ambition."—J. G. HOLLWAY. Gunby, Lincolns[illegible].

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

AMATEUR. Our next will contain some of the games played blindfold by Mr. Harrwitz against Prince Napoleon and the Duke of Brunswick.

J. K., Newcastle.—Assuredly Mr. STAUNTON is not as much surprised as you can be by the announcement of a book of problems with his name as the author, seeing that he has not written a Chess problem in his life. The worst turns out to be the wretched trick of a dishonest bookseller, who, having on hand some old numbers of the Chess Player's Chronicle, a magazine formerly edited by Mr. STAUNTON, has put them into boards and forged them out as a new work. We would recommend any person who has been duped into buying the volume to proceed against the vendor for obtaining money under false pretences.

M. P.—It were bound to promote your Pawn the moment it reached the 8th square by check, as a Queen, a Rook, or other Piece, without reference to the Pieces already on the board. The moves should be retracted to the point when you played the Pawn to its last square, and then, having claimed for him a Queen or other Piece, the game can be continued.

ANASTASIUS.—The New York Chess Magazine has not reached us. The annual subscription, we hear, is 6s.

MOSKITO COURT, A. M. E., D. D.—Your solutions previously sent were correct, but reached us too late for notice in the ordinary way.

ANASTASIUS.—The game shall be examined, but why conceal the names of the combatants?

A. L.—The Problem of moving the Knight successively over every square on the Chessboard contains forty-fifty different ways.

SOLUTIONS RECEIVED.—To No. 674, by C. G. T., L. L. B., F. D., Jun., Morpeth Court, P. P., Hyperion, W. H., W. S., D. R. A., M. P., S. S. A., Old Salt, Orion, Delta, N. J. G., W. J. H., H. W. G., Sunderland, Cato, Galileo, Dorothy, Mrs. Pilkerly, Julius Mancus, Pro tem., M. C., Alpha, Medium, Tridcut, are correct.

 Any amateur desiring to play a game by correspondence may hear of an antagonist of a similar degree of modérate skill by addressing a letter to "W. A. J., the Castle, Dover."

(a) We are not surprised at White's preferring this sacrifice to the retreat of his K Kt. In the one case he gets a brilliant attack (though the price paid for it is somewhat too high), in the other he would have been subjected to a very humiliating defence.

(b) Taking the Rook with Rook must have been fatal.

(c) Had White been tempted to capture the Q Bishop, an excellent move to all appearance, he would certainly have lost the game, for example—

|---|---|
| 15. | R takes B |
| 16 Q Kt takes K P | B takes Kt |
| 17 Kt takes B | P to K sq (best) |
| 18. Q to K 2nd | |

(Threatening to win the Bishop.)

|---|---|
| 18. | Q B to K B 2nd |
| 19. R to K B sq | Q B to K Kt 3rd |

(Has he any better move? If he play R to Q sq, then Q—— P to K 6th, &c.)

|---|---|
| 20. Kt takes B | P takes Kt |
| 21. B to K B 4th (ch) | K to R sq |

And the Game is past redemption.

(d) A grave error. He should have taken the Rook (checking), and then have moved it Kt to Q B 3rd, &c.

(e) Any other move would have enabled Black to come off with a drawn battle.

(f) He dared not take the Q Kt P, because White would immediately have played R to Q Kt 3rd, &c.

(g) In the forlorn hope that White may take the Bishop and let the Pawn "Queen."

(h) In the forlorn hope that White may take the Bishop and let the Pawn "Queen."

STATE OF SOCIETY IN THE SOUTHERN STATES.—The Baltimore Sun contains several articles of news showing a state of society in that city in comparison with which Arkansaw's stories are inn gaudium. The Sun, of December 5, says that Sabbath day amusements in Baltimore consists of "pistol fights between rival crowds of youths, whose ages are said to range from ten to sixteen years." The same paper of 8th December says, that the carrying of deadly weapons has become general, and that the youth are "growing up with a prevailing notion that killing is, in no technical sense, a venial thing." The Sun of 10th November, says that the city is paraded by bands of ruffians armed to the teeth, "utterly indifferent to, if not defiant of, the nominal municipal authorities. And this is not the limit to the crime. The most diabolical outbreaks in which has, over and over, startled the public ear—the deliberate act of homicide, the killing of men upon the slightest provocation, upon no provocation at all; and, in one instance at least, as a sort of pastime—consistent, it is true, with the character and tastes which recent events have brought into view. We know, all of us, that the very diabolism of murder is abroad in the community. Men's hearts are full of it. It would be folly to attempt affectation to deny that it is so, or to modify the expression of the fact. A very considerable number of men and youths in this community are at the day utterly bereft of all sense of the fatal tendency to the crime the compunction-fulness is with them reduced to its very minimum as an offence against society. And it is fit that we should fairly ask ourselves the question whether there are not very many who are ambitious of distinction among their fellows for having killed their man. Concede that this is so—we do not doubt it—and what a hideous emulation must be secretly agitating the minds and hearts of too many of the profligate youth banded in vicious associations amongst us."

THE WAR WITH CHINA.

CAPTURE OF FRENCH FOLLY FORT, NEAR CANTON, BY H.M.S. "BARRACOUTA" AND "COROMANDEL."—COMMENCEMENT OF THE ACTION.

THE advices by the Overland Mail confirm the statement we gave last week as to the Americans having taken part in the quarrel. It appears that a pinnace belonging to the United States' frigate Portsmouth was fired on by the Chinese as she was sounding opposite a fort, and one man killed. The American Admiral thereupon bombarded the fort, and after a cannonade of an hour and a half, which was vigorously replied to by the Chinese, the fort was silenced. The Portsmouth had one man mortally wounded, and a dozen shots in her. Two others of the squadron were also hit. The firing of the Americans is said not to have been so destructive as that of her Majesty's ship Barracouta. Next day the ships lay quiet, the Chinese making as great a display as possible, both inside and outside the forts, six guns being actually placed in position under the walls, flags waving, &c. The Commodore left the vessels at noon, and proceeded on board the San Jacinto at Whampoa, where he met Dr. Parker, the United States' Commissioner, after a consultation with whom he wrote a letter to the Imperial Commissioner, demanding satisfaction within twenty-four hours. This, however, would appear not to have been forthcoming; for, on the 21st, the boats of the Levant, Portsmouth, and San Jacinto successively attacked and captured three forts—Barrier Fort, Fidler's Reach Fort, and Island Fort—and destroyed their guns, 124 in number. At dawn the next morning they stormed another, called Square Fort, and destroyed its 41 guns. The loss in these operations is not clearly stated, but it seems to have been about six men killed and six wounded. The following edict has been issued by Governor Yeh:—

PROCLAMATION.

Yeh, Governor-General of the Two Kwang, issues this edict for the soldiers and people. Since I have taken charge of my office I have been indebted to you the people. You have looked upon me as your father, and I have looked upon you as children. Four years ago the rebels rose in several hundreds of thousands, and you ventured with united strength to resist them, which was very meritorious, not leaving a fragment of their remains. Even until now you have manifested your merits in behalf of the country. Now the barbarian rebels have raised disturbances, attacking our heavenly dynasty, destroying forts, burning the slops and making war on the city. The anxiety on this account has entered into my very bones and marrow; and your united wrath, too, has been aroused. Now, I have received the Imperial commands "firmly to hold and resolutely to fight and maintain the war from the public treasury; to blockade the river and sea, and to sweep out every fragment" You must, in behalf of the empire, exert your strength as brave soldiers, in order that not a fragment of the foreign robbers may remain In case there should be any speaking of peace, the speaker shall be dealt with according to martial law Did I not love the people as children, the barbarian rebels certainly would deceive them You must be faithful, and, with a pure heart, tremblingly obey.

The forts are said to be manned by junk-men, under the command of Shap-'ng-tan's Lieutenant; and a gunner, a deserter from the Salamander, is reported to be with him. That seamen were being engaged for service by Chinese was certain. Many of the river pirates are said to be European in disguise. Respecting the proceedings of the British squadron the China Mail says —

After the capture of the Bogue Forts, the Calcutta and Nankin remained behind, for the purpose of blowing them up no easy job, and the fort at Ty-cock-tow having fired upon the Hornet, Captain Shadwell took possession of it, after driving out the Chinese, and spiked its fifty five guns In the morning the steamers were annoyed by a number of long pull-away war-junks, which came out of the narrow creeks, fired, and retired The boats chased them, but returned unsuccessful The Seamen Fort also fired upon the steamers, and several shot reached as far down as opposite the factories, but without doing any damage. A body of artillery was sent to destroy the fort, and, the party having been molested by some of the enemy's sharpshooters, the Samson sent a few shells among the houses, which dislodged them One shell went right through the roof of Dr Hobson's Hospital, and must have done much damage, as the building is known to have been filled with "Braves" at the time and a hideous yell issued from it immediately after the explosion The business was completed in the evening, when the trains were fired, and four mines which had been sunk exploded During the night one of the Nankin's boats, astern of the Barracouta, was towed under water, and two poor fellows drowned Captain Cooper, of the Royal Engineers, has been busily engaged in arrangements for the defence of the factories Chains, it is said, are to be sunk up in the Barracouta, intended to be stretched across the river as a defence against fire-rafts The Barracouta will also take up four officers and 100 men of the 59th Regiment, to replace the Americans withdrawn, and to relieve the Winchester's crew, who are to return to Hong-Kong Dutch Folly, in addition to the Sybille's 68-pounders, is armed with the Nassau's 32-cwt gun, and garrisoned by the Sybille's men, under Lieutenants Dent and Nares. Mr Hudson mate, and Messrs Jackson, Brice, and De Bagh midshipmen French Folly is still in the hands of the Chinese, strongly manned and heavily armed The Calcutta and Nankin are engaged in the destruction of the Bogue Forts, the Samson and Comus are at the Barrier in the Macao passage, the Coromandel at the lower 8s-men Fort, the Acorn and Hornet abreast of the factories, with two junks anchored ahead, a boom being carried from the junks to the shore, leaving a very narrow passage for the boats, which must bear a pass from the British Consulate, and have the British flag flying The Barracouta leaves Hong Kong to-night November 20 or early to-morrow, with men and ammunition Yesterday November 15, while a cargo-boat was loading with gunpowder, &c., at the Ordnance Wharf, two lads strolled down with baskets, filled with chips of wood, with the intention, apparently, of emptying them into the sea, instead of which they suddenly set them on fire, and threw them into the boat, and the sentries were so astonished that they allowed them both to escape. The gunpowder being in tins, no damage was done, but the very act itself shows there is more daring in Chinese than in foreigners are inclined to give them credit for. —P.S. We have just heard that replies from Yeh were received yesterday afternoon (Nov. 19) to despatches from Sir John Bowring and Dr. Parker, but their contents had not transpired. A party of "Braves" made their appearance yesterday (Nov. 19) at the barrack near Atow's Hotel, beating gongs, waving flags, and shouting valiantly The guard was turned out, but the enemy had retired, frightened, probably, at the sight of the Winchester's field piece.

THE BREACHING BATTERY, DUTCH FOLLY FORT.

The Engravings we give this week represent some of the principal scenes of the bombardment of Canton. The principal attack on the French Folly Forts commenced on the 28th of October. In the night of the 27th eighteen men of the Royal Artillery, under Captain Ratton and a subaltern, went up to Canton in the Lily, and next morning took charge of the two 32-pounders placed in position the day before by the blue-jackets on the Dutch Folly. Eighty marines and small-arm men, with Captain Keith Stewart and Lieutenant Caster, also went up the same night in the Coromobel The land force, too, was increased by forty-five men from the United States' ship Levant. Firing from the Dutch Folly (under the command of Captain Hall, of the Calcutta) commenced at nine at one o'clock on the 28th, at almost point-blank range, in order to breach the wall. The Encounter, meanwhile, fired shell in excellent style. The heights of Canton were covered with soldiers, and the housetops with men, fearless, apparently, of the shot. In the first quarter of an hour eighteen shots were fired from the Dutch Folly, and a steady fire, getting slower by degrees, was continued till dark; the Encounter also throwing in a shell about every quarter of an hour or twenty minutes. The result of the fire was that the Governor-General's house was set on fire about two p.m., and the fire continued all the afternoon, extending on both sides, but less towards the factories than down the river. The marines, about 100 strong, had been embarked to go down and hold the part of the city wall that the two guns were breaching through or over the Governor's house; but on the fire breaking out they were relanded, and the Folly continued a steady fire into the mass of smoke and flame in front. While this was going on the elders of the villages around circulated remonstrances on red paper round the factories.

The fire, which commenced on the afternoon of the 28th, continued throughout the night, and laid bare the south wall of the city for a distance of between two and three hundred yards—the hongs and houses destroyed being those valuable properties between the wall and the sea (Quanmee, Tunghing, and other Chinchew hongs). The Encounter's gun gave her first shot on the 29th, at about half-past seven, and was soon after followed by the guns in the Dutch Folly. The Coromandel went down for more of the Nankin's and Calcutta's men.

A little after seven on the morning of the 29th, Honqua, and a Mandarin with a blue button without feather, called on Consul Parkes and held a most animated conversation for nearly an hour. There appeared to be but little ceremony in the matter as passers-by, attracted by the Consul's loud tones, could see him sitting uncovered. All that could be gleaned from Chinese bystanders was, "No can settee." The Admiral went into the Consulate during the interview Honqua and his comrade, with four mandarin-capped attendants, took their departure as they came, in a small hong-boat at the garden steps.

A reference to Admiral Seymour's letter of the 30th October elucidates the result of this interview The anonymous Mandarin of the foregoing paragraph was the prefect (so to call him) of Lee-Lootoo, who had been sent by the Governor-General Yeh to the British Consulate, to ascertain the extent of our demands. Consul Parkes delivered to him from Admiral Seymour this demand;—"That the foreign representatives at Canton should have the same access to the Chinese authorities as at the other ports. The protest was, moreover, told, before leaving the Consulate, that the British Admiral, satisfied that he was right, had resolved to wait the Governor-General at his palace, and that if the gates were not opened to him he would enter "through the wall."

To the demand of the Admiral no answer was returned: but about eleven a.m. the Chinese opened fire on the British from the French Folly. The storming party shortly afterwards left the ships for the ditch previous to the Dutch Folly. The firing from French Folly had by this time ceased. One of the flagstaffs fronting the Yamun was knocked down by the Folly shot. The Encounter kept up a brisk shelling. Commander Bates and Master Johnson gallantly mounted the breach the storming party landed, and, for a few minutes, stood a sharp fire of musketry, fortunately unscathed. Enough was seen on the reconnoitre to conclude the plan of attack, and at 12 p.m. the storming party, between 200 and 300, under Commodore Elliot, Captain the Hon. Keith Stewart leading the naval small-arm men—left the Folly. At 2.40 they mounted the breach, and kept up brisk volleys on the Chinese soldiery, who only returned it long enough to kill one of our marines and to wound six others. Immediately on the breach the first to plant the British flag, quickly followed on to the wall by Captains Penrose and Boyle, and Lieutenants Burton, Henry, Swale, and Allnutt, with their marines. The city gate, about one hundred yards east of the breach, being opened sufficiently for one to pass, Admiral Seymour, attended by Captain Hall, of the Calcutta, entered at precisely 3.10 p.m. Shots from the Chinese were still pinging in dangerous proximity, when his Excellency ordered a field piece, mounted in the breach, to be directed on a huge mud wall fronting the Governor-General's Yamun. Commodore Elliot, however, appeared to think there was a shorter way of getting in than that, and proceeded to cut down a wood palisading on the side—through which, at 3.40 p.m. Admiral Seymour and suite proceeded on the approach to the Governor-General's reception-hall.

On arriving at this place three dead bodies were the only discoverable representatives of Chinese humanity; and Admiral Seymour, simply taking a turn round the apartments, returned to the breach and shortly after left for the Folly.

It being impossible to hold the walls without a much larger force, the stormers retired at a little before six—the rumour among the Chinese being that they were driven back. As the marines were leaving them the wall they were fired on from mounted gingalls—the effect being two killed on the spot and some half a dozen wounded.

The latest accounts from Canton state that French Folly Fort was again occupied by the Chinese, and that Sir M. Seymour was meditating the recapture of it.

NEW PLANTS AND FRUITS OF MESSRS. MARTIN.

WHATEVER jealousy we may have had of the extension of French dominion on the Mediterranean some years ago, there can be no doubt that the conquest of Algeria, and the gradual occupation of the districts behind, have been productive of a great accession of knowledge of the vegetable kingdom of Africa, and to the establishment of Messrs. Martin, of Paris, at their temporary dépôt in New Bond-street, has acquainted us with several specimens of fruit which created astonishment; while the new plants from the Atlas region, as well as some from California, show the singular richness of the vegetable kingdom in those remote and hitherto little-explored mountain regions.

Louis Martin, born at Venose, in the department of the Isère, was gardener to Prince Torlonia, the eminent banker of Rome; and, desiring to know more of the highland regions to which access had been procured by the activity and valour of his fellow-countrymen in Algeria, proceeded to Africa with other amateurs; and we have here some of the plants sent to Paris, as well as some others from California, and fruits from the south of France, which have created much admiration on the other side of the Channel, and which are here only beginning to be known to the general amateurs of this delightful pursuit.

Of the fruits in the catalogue we are most struck with the Bi-ha Inzengore, from the nursery, of M. Aubinet, of Farascon, a pear of extraordinary delicacy of flavour, weighing between 2 and 3 lbs. The peach-like Bergamote Oranaise and Beurré Morette, of the same weight. The peach of Oran is of great size and small stone. The plums of Oran are also very fine; but it is admitted that in size and flavour they are beaten by the English plum of our best horticulturists. The cherries of Tlemecen, perfected in France (Cerise Crealy), have bunches weighing 2 lb. The Avocadier, from California, has the taste of fresh butter, the large green fruit attaining the weight of no less than 6 lb. The Curambolier is of great beauty (Averrhoa), tasting like honey, and the fruit of a bright yellow. To which we may add the Pomme d'Acajou (Anacardium), or "heart-like Mahogany Apple," the kernel being altogether outside, tasting like a delicate almond, and the fruit itself luscious. Perhaps none is more remarkable than the Strawberry of Morocco, from the spurs of the Atlas, a tree with a profusion of fruit, whereof the finer specimen of the usual strawberry, two pounds weight and five inches in diameter. It resembles the Annnas Muricata of California, but has a much more delicate taste.

From the same vast region of unexplored forests, defended by the feline beast of prey and the formidable serpent, we have the finest specimen of the gentian family we have seen. The Calypso Africana, of the most beautiful pyramidal construction, the cups of the most exquisite velvet-like tissue, and of a deep palpitating cerulean blue colour. We have also from the Atlas the Lilium Lancifolium Auranthesm, a lily that looks exactly like the skin of one of those panthers that guard this mainland Garden of the Hesperides. We have far from exhausted the catalogue of these novelties; but enough has been said to indicate the value of the plants which can be procured at this establishment.

PROGRESS OF THE IRON MANUFACTURE.—As the iron business of this State bears something of a fixed relative proportion to that of the entire country being rather less than one half, and yet more than two-fifths of the whole in the absence of specific data touching the progress of the business in our State we may form a loose conjecture on this point from what we know of the past history of its production in the United States. In the year 1810 the production of iron in the United States amounted to 50,000 tons, from which amount it slightly and gradually declined onward to 1820. Between that date and 1840 it increased though almost uniform gradations till it reached 325,000 tons in this State, however, statistics show that but 100,000 tons were made in that year, although in 1842 the production amounted to 150,000. Throughout the whole country the two years 1840 and 1841 witnessed a decline of nearly 100,000 tons, when the production began to rise rapidly and steadily till it reached 800,000 tons in 1847 and 1848. In consequence of the pecuniary revulsions and disquietudes of that period the domestic manufacture of iron fell by gradual stages to 500,000 tons in 1853; from which epoch it has again risen at a uniform and rapid rate till in 1855, as we have seen, it amounted to 1,000,000 tons. In 1847 the production in this State was 338,350 tons; but it sank, in 1849, to 253,316 tons. In 1854 it had increased to 424,324 tons, with 201,96- tons of finished iron. The present year, which is just closing, will show an increase over the production of 1855. In these memoranda of our State more than thirty millions of money are invested; and more than 40,000 men and boys are employed in the two branches of the business—the making and the finishing—who represent, it is supposed, a population of nearly 200,000 souls, and a very considerable fraction of the whole population."—North American.

A BELGIAN SNUB.—It is affirmed, says a Brussels correspondent, that Count Vilain XIV., Minister for Foreign Affairs, visited Lord Howard on Saturday; and, in the most courteous and becoming terms, expressed his surprise and regret at that portion of Sir R. Peel's address which affected this country and its Envoy at Moscow; and further begged leave to state that this language, coming from a member of the British Government, in conjunction with Lord Derby's earlier sarcasms on the Belgian army, was highly calculated to produce unpleasant irritation, and prejudice cordial and most desirable relations between the two countries. Count Vilain is also reported to have requested the British Envoy to communicate his observations semi-officially to Lord Clarendon, whilst he stated that he had written in the same sense to M. Van de Weyer at London. To this Lord Howard de Walden is said to have rejoined that he fully participated in the Belgian Minister's regrets that the tenour of Sir Robert's speech should have been such as to offend this country, individually or collectively; that public opinion in England had spoken out freely on the subject, as testified by the severe criticisms of the British press; and that his Lordship would not fail to meet the Count's request by communicating his observations semi-officially to the British Foreign office.

THE LATE JOHN BRITTON.

MR JOHN BRITTON is no less remarkable for the number of works upon which he has been engaged as editor, than for the important services which he has rendered to mediæval art. Although of the humblest origin, deficient in education, and without the leisure in his youth to study in his studies, he overcame all these disadvantages by the unity and firmness of a strong will, determined to carry out its purpose.

One of the most remarkable points in his character was the adoption of so abstruse a subject as our national antiquities; and the judgment which led him to disregard the little minute articles of virtù which are recently almost the attention of the petty schools of draughtsmen and his labours upon the edifices of the Gothic period a grand and noble subject—at best developing the skill and taste of our forefather.

The judgment, also, with which he adopted under Dallaway's superior class of illustrations proves that he at once rose to the importance of his subject. Those who for a moment reflect upon the works of a Grose, a Pennant, and others, must cast their eyes upon the volumes edited by Britton, will see an advance in taste, intelligence, and true conception of art, which throws the former complete into the shade, and super-sedes them. To effect this he had to create a school of draughtsmen and engravers; and this he did with consummate address; and it is only necessary to quote the names of some of the men whom he gathered around him and induced to co-operate in his works as draughtsmen—Alexander, Bartlett, Ed. Blore, J. Carter, Cattermole, C. Fielding, J. and W. Hakewill, Nash, Nell, Pordon, Prout, J. A. Repton, Westall, W. Wallis, Wild. In their drawings they renounce both the coarse, scratchy, and unmeaning lines of the draughtsmen of former antiquarian works, or the formal precision of the archæologist, and he introduced a purity, a sentiment, and a truthful view of the subject which was the true principle.

He also created a school of engraving that gave a fulness, and depth, and pathos (if I may so say) to the Gothic details that they had hitherto never possessed. In fact, no truthful view of representations can be procured from the burin of a Le Keux, a Lowry, a Rolfe, a Woolnoth, and others, that they have ever since formed the type for subsequent productions, both in this and foreign publications; and were worthily employed in the illustration of other ecclesiastical edifices, as in the volumes upon Canterbury, Lincoln, and Westminster Abbey, by Woolnoth, Wild, and Wallis.

It had hitherto been thought sufficient to satisfy the general reader with slight views of the antiquities of our country, but he with great perseverance perceived that the public mind was prepared, and ready to appreciate and understand more scientific detail, even of a technical nature. He, therefore, added his elaborate plan, filled in with all the accompaniments of the groinings, pavement, and other expressive minutiæ, and completed the group of the cathedral by the addition of the cloisters, chapter-houses, and monastic buildings. He gave the section, showing the masterly system of the construction and combinations of the masses to produce the equipoise. He feared not to introduce geometrical elevations, heightened by all the effects of chiaroscuro and masterly touches of solemn sentiment; and these were further explained by brilliant portions of detail, delineated with a sparkling crisp handling that converted a dry individual part into an attractive portion of the whole. A few perspectives from well-chosen points, by the pencil of a Prout, a Westall, or a Bartlett, completed the series of impressive and attractive renderings, by which the volume became as acceptable in the drawing-room as it was in the library or study.

He possessed considerable fluency of words, but his style of writing was deficient in taste and refinement. But he judiciously availed himself of the pens of the clergy, or secured the aid of other men whose superior education and intelligence better qualified them for the task of preparing the text of his more important works. He, therefore, presents the very striking instance of a man who, with determined energy of purpose and acuteness of perception, undertook colossal works; unable to conceive with propriety the slightest design himself, he could appreciate what was accurate, beautiful, and chaste, in the various monuments that he illustrated; without any power of the pencil, he knew how to select and direct his draughtsmen and engravers, and to create a new school of exquisite illustration. Thus, in fact, to avail himself of the abilities of other men in order to realise the noble schemes which he himself had the genius (I may say) to feel, the daring enterprise to conceive, and the perseverance to complete under adverse and insuperable difficulties.

There was a certain generous sympathy with genius, and with the efforts of struggling talent, that was peculiarly pleasing in his character; and he never shrank from the expression of his admiration for the talents and estimable qualities of others. Thus the dedication of his works was often influenced by other than interested motives; and vast numbers of his plates were inscribed to antiquaries, artists, and to authors or poets, painters, or sculptors—instigated less by personal feelings than a generous appreciation of intellectual and moral qualities in those public-spirited men, to whom he bore the willing testimony of his unreserved respect.

Although pursuing a distinct class of antiquarian research, and differing essentially in his mental qualifications, yet Britton deserves to rank with those eminent archæologists, Rickman and Cahuac; whose loss we have recently been called upon to deplore. In this triad the two latter represented the German and Italian schools—the learned investigators of the history, customs, mythology, and art of nations or classic periods. John Britton fairly represents the English school, which devotes itself more immediately to Christian, or Mediæval, art, and the illustration of our national antiquities; which he has done in order so attractive as to command the sympathies and affections of his readers.

THE IMPORTS OF WINES AND SPIRITS.—A comparison has been prepared of the imports of wines and spirits in the year 1855, as published by the Board of Trade, with those of the year 1856, showing the results of an interval of twenty years. In 1835, according to the Custom-house, the total importation of wine was 9,039,551 gallons, while that in 1856 was only 8,946,766—showing a decrease of 92,785 gallons. The total quantity of spirits consumed in 1835 was 7,901,717 gallons, and that in 1856 being 10,742,259—showing an increase of 2,762,542 gallons. The total amount of revenue paid on both wines and spirits was, in 1835, £4,736,871; and in 1856, £4,245,862—showing a decrease of £491,219. Thus, the total increase in the importation of wines and spirits, during this period, for the United Kingdom, scarcely exceeds fifteen per cent; while there is a large falling off in the revenue collected. The latter circumstance is accounted for partly by a reduction in the duty of 22s. 6d. to 15s. per gallon on brandy, and partly by the falling off in the importation of wines. The increase in the importation of spirits in the outports has been considerable, while that in the port of London has not been equal to ten per cent. The expense incurred in the collection and assessment of this branch of the revenue in the latter year is stated to have been increased more than 140 per cent since 1835; and a proposal is now alleged to have been made for a further addition to this outlay. In comparing the returns of the year 1856 with those of 1795, being an interval of 61 years, the extraordinary fact presents itself that there is a falling off of 1,440,249 gallons in the total quantities of wines and spirits entered for home consumption. In brandy alone the falling off—making due allowance for the difference of measurement—has been more than 400,000 gallons. Thus, while the importations of tea, sugar, coffee, cocoa, spices, fruits (such as currants), raisins, plums, and other necessaries of life, have increased from 100 to 150 per cent, the consumption of foreign spirits has decreased very considerably.

OFFICE-HUNTERS IN AMERICA.—There is another class that is daily increasing, and which is a perfect nuisance to a party by far more formidable than the lobby-agent, but equally unprincipled and soulless. I mean the office-beggar or place-seeker. It is estimated that not less than five hundred of these patriots are living in this city, soliciting influence in their behalf. Many of the principals are represented by agents who are paid in proportion to the number and weight of the names they obtain to their petitions. Applications from New York City, who has undertaken to get filled up a petition favouring the appointment of a notorious "hard" to the office of collector, is promised a hundred dollars for the name of Senator Douglas, highly worthy of the place, I presume, he cannot obtain, as the Senator does not wish thus early to commit himself. He has, however, received his promise. Speaking of the value of signatures, while Judge Douglas's commissioner is in search of names, that of Senator Cass has a value of only ten dollars, owing to the circumstance that the General not unfrequently through forgetfulness, signs in favour of a half dozen or more for the same office. The value of the signatures ranges from five dollars to a "private drink;" but, of course, this stockjobbing in the persons of an eminent man is a "profound secret," with the parties operating. A "soft" of your city, who is in want of a surveyorship, a few days since applied to General Pierce for his influence with Mr. Buchanan, but the General politely declined, because he could not consistently participate in transactions with the Democratic Committee of your city, but he intended going to Washington in a few days, and would see what he could do for the applicant on the back of their notes. It is not to be got at in the streets, as I suppose you do in London, but will be dogged to his private rooms, and watched over, if he is in bed, for the first opening of his eyes. The number of New Yorkers here, who are collecting materials for an early onslaught upon Mr. Buchanan, are about ten to one to those from any other section of the Union, and fresh ones arrive every day. The "hards" refuse a recognition of the "softs," whilst the latter claim to be the true Democrats. Under these circumstances, it will be somewhat trouble to Mr. Buchanan, which can only be avoided by rejecting the claims of the extremes of both factions. On a quire of paper before me I have the names of some two or three hundred candidates of your city who are anxious to serve their country under Mr. Buchanan.—Washington Correspondent of the New York Herald.

THE SPANISH CORTES.—The Cortes are convoked for the 1st of May next. The electoral law will be that of 1846. The Senate is to be composed of the same members as those who sat in the Senate of the year 1854. Those resolutions are published in the Madrid Gazette.

A letter from Parma, of the 8th inst., in the Risorgimento of Turin, announces that the Austrians are to quit the duchy in February.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC

Her Majesty has permitted a selection to be made from the works of mediæval art in the Royal collection at Windsor Castle, for the forthcoming exhibition at Manchester.

A bulletin in Tuesday's Moniteur announces that the Prince Imperial has been under the influence of slight cough and fever for two days.

We have reason to believe (says the Globe) that the Address in the Commons, in reply to her Majesty's Speech from the Throne, will be moved by Sir John Rae Reid.

Lord and Lady Palmerston are making considerable alterations at Cambridge-house for the forthcoming season.

AT a numerous and influential Meeting held at the Mansion House, Dublin, on MONDAY JANUARY 5, for the purpose of raising a FUND for the RELIEF of the MOTHER and CHILD of the late Mr. GEORGE SAMUEL LITTLE—

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor in the Chair—

The following Resolutions were passed unanimously:—

Moved by the Right Hon. John Matchelly, seconded by Benjamin Lee Guinness, Esq.—

Resolved—That feelings, as we do in common with our fellow-citizens the deep bereavement which the family of the late Mr. Little have sustained in his sudden removal from amongst us by the hand of an assassin, we beg to express to Mrs Little and the other members of his family our cordial sympathy in the affliction with which it has pleased the Almighty Disposer of all events to visit them.

Proposed by E. G. Hayden, Esq., M.P.; seconded by Nathaniel Rone, Esq.—

Resolved—That, as the mother and sister of the late Mr Little were dependent upon him, we feel it incumbent on us to open a subscription for their benefit, and to solicit the aid of our fellow-citizens in carrying out this purpose in a befitting manner.

Proposed by Alexander Parker, Esq.; seconded by Willoughby Bond, Esq.—

Resolved—That it is the opinion of this meeting that the funds to be collected should be invested in government securities, and that £10 a year for the benefit of Mrs Little for her life, with remainder to her children, if any, during their minority.

Proposed by Joseph Boyce, Esq.; seconded by Richard Dowse, Esq.—

Resolved—That the following gentlemen be appointed to act as a committee for carrying out this benevolent undertaking:—

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

THERE is always, according to some persons, a crisis in the national fortunes, and the Parliament that is about to assemble is always charged with duties more important than ever devolved upon Parliament in days gone by. The estimate may, to the philosophic mind, appear ridiculous, but it is, nevertheless, natural. A crisis, or what was supposed to be a crisis, is speedily forgotten—sometimes before we have well got through it; and no business which has been settled a year, or even a week ago, is equal in magnitude to the business upon which tongues have yet to wag and passions to be excited. The public will, therefore, suppose in 1857 as they supposed in 1856, that a new February and a new Crisis take possession of the world together; and that the second month of the year is no more to be dissociated from serious business than April from its showers, or May from its pleasanter gifts of buds and blossoms.

The Queen will not this year grace the opening of Parliament with her presence. The chief topics of the Speech which will be read in her Majesty's name by the Lord Chancellor may easily be anticipated. The conclusion of the war in the Crimea; the desirability of such reforms in Turkey as will tend to strengthen the empire at home and make it respected abroad; the settlement of the quarrel of the King of Prussia with the Swiss Republic; the happy continuance and increasing cordiality of the alliance of Great Britain and France; the approaching evacuation of the Grecian territories and waters by the armies of France and the navies of England; and a vague allusion to the affairs of Naples;—each of these will form the subject of a paragraph which the two Houses of Parliament will hear with attention, and re-echo with more or less unanimity of approval.

Asiatic affairs demand, and will indubitably receive, especial mention, although the public will have to await the debates on the Address for the explanation which Ministers are bound to give of the causes which have produced the almost simultaneous rupture of our pre-existing amity with the two celebrated empires of Persia and China. Scarcely any man of public note has had the temerity to declare that the last or the present Administration sought war in Europe, or left untried any honourable means to prevent it. We believe that, when the facts shall be made known, a similar unwillingness to make war will be found to have influenced the deliberations and the resolves of those who are charged with the government of our Asiatic empire; and that the war with China, like the war with Persia, was only undertaken when it had become obviously and palpably impossible to avoid it without dishonour and danger. We may be certain, too, that hostilities will be conducted with the energy befitting a great people; and we may reasonably indulge the hope that the issue of these wars will be conducive not only to the future peace of Asia but to the permanent advantage of the Persian and Chinese nations.

We may also expect that the affairs of the United States of America, in so far as the politics of Great Britain are connected with them, will afford materials for the most graceful as well as the most grateful paragraph of the Royal Speech. The temporary estrangement—not between the two nations, but between those who were at the head of affairs in each—has been removed; the diplomatic relations, which were never interrupted in London, thanks to the good feeling, no less than to the good sense, of the Palmerston Administration, have been renewed in Washington; and the Government of the United States receives in the person of Lord Napier an English Ambassador whom all parties will be delighted to honour. Under his auspices, supported as he will be by the remembrance of the Resolute, so honourable to both nations, the last traces of coldness and estrangement will disappear. We may hope at the same time that the foundations of an Anglo-American alliance will be laid—an alliance greater and nobler and more auspicious for humanity—than any possible European alliances, either present or prospective; but it is almost too much to hope that expression to such a sentiment will be given in so stiff and formal a document as a Royal Message. But, as the Ministers in their public private character have greater latitude, it is not impossible that some such happy departure from routine may signalise the debates of the approaching week. The alliance of England and France, although a great fact, is not the greatest possible. America may not yet be ready to join it; but the day may come when even this master-stroke of policy may be accomplished.

The domestic affairs of the country will probably receive but little notice in the Royal Speech—if we except the two questions of National Education and the Transportation and Reformation of Criminals. When such men as Sir John Pakington and Mr. Cobden unite in a scheme for the education of the people, and when such a man as Lord John Russell is prepared to join them, we may be assured that the Session will be rendered memorable by an earnest attempt to settle this great and growing question. The renewal of transportation—as the cheapest, the most merciful, and the most effectual mode of dealing with the superabundant criminals of a closely-packed community—is certain to receive early attention. It is one of the questions that will not keep. It is one in which there are no party and sectarian jealousies to block the way, and we may reasonably expect that it will be dealt with in a manner befitting alike its urgency and its importance.

Two other questions are before the public; and although they may not have much, if any, prominence in the Royal Speech, they will be sufficiently prominent in the public mind before the Session is a fortnight old. Lord John Russell has come, or is coming, home, with a new Reform Bill in his pocket, and, if the Premier do not forestall him by the introduction of a better, will monopolise for a time the attention of Parliament and the country. In either case the question will advance a stage, and, after the lapse of a quarter of a century, the work of 1832 will be carried nearer to completion. The question of the Income and Property Tax—unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer take the sting out of it by as prompt and graceful a renunciation as his official soul can endure—will be debated with more acerbity. All the world is not agreed upon the necessity of popular Education; upon the desirability of Transportation; or upon the political and social expediency of a new Reform in Parliament; but all the world agrees that a Property and Income Tax of sixteenpence in the pound is a very great nuisance; the more especially as more than one half of it goes towards the payment of a war for which the nation has nothing to show, except a treaty of peace, in the durability of which no one has any well-grounded confidence. We may therefore expect that this will be the question of the Session, and wish the Ministers as well as the people a happy deliverance from the fiscal perplexities which it will occasion.

SKETCHES FROM CANTON.

THE FOREIGN FACTORIES.—CANTON PIRATE-BOAT.

In the "Narrative of the American Expedition to the China Seas and Japan" (recently published in New York, and sold in London by Trübner and Co.), Dr. Hawks refers to the passage from Whampoo to Canton in boats as by no means very agreeable. Commodore Perry describes the stream as muddy and shallow, with scarcely a hut upon its banks until the city is nearly reached, when swarms of floating habitations are seen moored to the banks, five or six tiers deep, and occupied by a wretched, half-clad people. Through these two lines of receptacles of poverty and filth which thus border the stream you pass to the mercantile factory, the residence of most of the foreign merchants, and the spot where the stranger lands. Hence he is conducted to the houses of those to whom he bears letters of introduction, where he is hospitably received, and takes up his lodging, as there are no comfortable places of public entertainment in this quarter.

On the visit of the Commodore to Canton, he, together with several of his officers, was accommodated at the house of Mr. Forbes, the Consul of the United States, and the head of the firm of Russell and Co. So well known was this establishment, and so highly appreciated were its proprietors by the Chinese, that, in making a purchase in the city, it was only necessary to direct the shopkeeper to send the article to the house of Mr. Forbes, and there was never any hesitation in assenting at once.

The comparatively small space occupied by the foreigners on the river-side is, notwithstanding its limited extent, a pleasant spot. The whole quarter contains about four acres. The foreign merchants occupy the large buildings in the rear as places of business and abode; while the front, which includes half of the whole area, is beautifully laid out as a garden, with an English church in the centre, and the flags of different nations floating from tall poles planted in various spots. The grounds are arranged with walks, and ornamented with shrubbery and flowering plants, presenting a delightful resort in the freshness of the morning or the cool of the evening. The stranger is struck with the peculiar aspect of the place, when on one side, in proximity to low, dingy, Chinese houses, buildings of European structure rise to the height of three or four stories, while on the other the river is densely populous with the inhabited boats. The foreigners term their residences and places of business factories, but the natives designate them as kongs, which is the usual Chinese word for a commercial establishment or warehouse.

Although there are but few of the larger or public buildings in the foreign quarter, which is but a suburb of the city, there are all the ordinary varieties of streets, houses, and bazaars. Foreigners generally confine their visits to that part adjacent to the garden before mentioned, through which Old and New China streets run.

The only hotel in the place, frequented by Europeans and Americans, is near the latter street, and is of quite an inferior character. It is the hospitable practice of the foreign merchants to invite strangers to their princely establishments, where a generous profusion and a warm welcome are extended to the visitor. In addition to Old and New China streets, there is, hard by, a narrow, filthy alley, not inappropriately called Hog-lane, and filled with the most abandoned portion of the people, who minister to the vicious appetites of the foreign sailors, supplying them with wretched grog and other dangerous stimulants.

Upon page 86 we have engraved a View of the Foreign Factories, from a drawing by a Chinese artist; and from the same hand is engraved the specimen of a Canton Pirate-boat upon the preceding page. The American Expedition had some rough experiences with this craft. The Narrative relates:—

The river swarms with pirates, the fishermen occasionally becoming their allies, and they carry on their depredations unchecked in the very teeth of the forts. When the pirates fall of falling in with strangers whom they dare venture to rob, they fall out with each other, and murder and plunder their friends with as little compunction as if they were strangers. In the passage of the Mississippi from Macao to Whampoa, the anchorage on the Canton river, one of the two Chinese boats in tow was swamped by bad steering, whereupon the other, in fear of a similar catastrophe, cast off and attempted to proceed up the river. The owner, who happened to be on board the steamer, expressed his fears that she would be overhauled by pirates before her arrival at Whampoa; nor were his fears groundless, she was boarded and robbed a few hours only after she had lost sight of the Mississippi. While the steamer was at Hong-Kong several piracies were committed almost under the guns of the vessels of war. As for the land pirates, they are to the full as expert at picking and stealing as the most accomplished thieves and pickpockets at New York or London. One of the Lieutenants of the Mississippi, at early twilight one evening, just as he was stepping into a hired boat to return to the ship, was seized amid a crowd of people, and an attempt was made to put his watch from his fob; fortunately his Pickwickian rotundity of form saved the watch, but the chain was carried off in triumph.

Mr. Sirr, in his "China and the Chinese," thus refers to the piracies in the China Seas:—

The pirate vessels and boats are peculiarly constructed, being remarkably fast. The crews are numerous, and the vessels are fully armed with guns, swivels, matchlocks, spears, boarding-pikes, and other weapons of an offensive description. Their usual mode of proceeding is as follows:—As soon as they get within reach of their victims, they throw on board the doomed vessel a large quantity of fire-balls, so prepared as to produce an intolerable and non-offensive odour when explosion takes place; missiles of all kinds are thus scattered around. When the terror and confusion thus created is at its height, the pirates grapple and board the prize, when, if resistance is offered, too frequently all on board are butchered in a savage manner. Pirates infest the seas between Hong-Kong, Macao, and Canton, inhabiting the Ladrone Islands surrounding Hong-Kong, which seem to be abandoned to their sovereignty; and the passage between these forts is thus rendered extremely hazardous, both as regards life and property.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, Thursday.

THE lion of the day is decidedly Ferouk Khan, the Persian Ambassador. On Saturday he was presented at the Tuileries, in great state; three of the imperial carriages—two of them with six horses—being sent to the hotel of the Comte Jules de Lesseps, in the Avenue Montaigne, where he is domiciled, to carry him, with the chief personages of his suite, to the palace. The costume of the Ambassador consisted of a magnificent robe of cashmere, ornamented with fur, and fastened with diamond clasps; trousers of white cashmere, with gold band, and the usual high, pointed cap of Astrakan. Feroukh Khan (who speaks but a few words of French) pronounced an address to the Emperor, which was translated by M. Kasimirski; and in Napoleon's reply—similarly rendered—allusion was made to the war between England and Persia, the Emperor expressing his regret that the Sovereign Ferouk Khan represented should be engaged in hostilities with a nation he considered as among his "best friends;" and adding his hope that the presence of the Ambassador in France might tend to facilitate the arrangement of the differences existing between the Government of Great Britain and Persia. Ferouk Khan is the bearer of offerings from the Sultan, consisting of the Order of the Sun for the Emperor; a necklace of splendid pearls for the Empress; and a magnificent sabre, with jewelled hilt, for the Prince Imperial. Beside these he brings the Emperor some Persian horses, extremely tall and extremely ugly.

While we are on the subject of Oriental news we may state that Amic Pacha, son of the late Viceroy of Egypt, and who is stated to possess a fortune of sixty millions of francs, is about to marry the daughter of the Sultan, and has sent emissaries here and elsewhere to choose diamonds to an enormous amount.

It is said that the visit of the Grand Duke Constantine to France is quite decided upon, and that it is probable it will take place before Lent, or perhaps immediately after; the strictness of that period (more especially among the Russians, who fast with peculiar severity) rendering it impossible for France to give the Imperial guest such a reception as it would desire to offer.

The first volumes of the "Correspondance de l'Empereur Napoléon I." are about shortly to appear; and, in order to render the work as complete as possible, the commission charged with its execution has addressed a new appeal to all persons, native or foreign, who may have any documents or information to afford on the subject.

It appears that new projects are being conceived for the further improvement and embellishment of Paris, and that it is probable their execution will not be very long delayed. Among these is a work of great extent and importance in the city, which consists of the demolition of the houses at present existing on the Quai des Orfèvres and the Rue de la Sainte Chapelle, which will form a public promenade to be continued as far as Notre Dame. The Quai of the Marché Neuf, the Rue du Cloître Notre Dame, &c., will be enlarged, straightened, and otherwise improved; and a new Morgue will be constructed at the eastern extremity of the Isle St. Louis. At the other side of the Palais de Justice, the Boulevard de Sébastopol, and the destruction of the buildings of the Hôtel Dieu (which is said to enter into the arrangements), will produce still greater changes in this quarter—changes in themselves beneficial, but which, in the present state of suffering to which the working population of Paris is reduced—a state unquestionably sorely aggravated by this wholesale system of demolition of the only dwellings their poverty enables them at the present crisis to occupy—cannot fail to add materially to the amount of distress and discontent already existing. To men who have not roofs under which to shelter themselves and their families, it is scant consolation that they have a new promenade on the Quais, where even they may not, in default of other lodging, establish themselves for the night, at the sign of the Belle Etoile, to contemplate at their leisure the flowing of the Seine. Furthermore, for the plan of the establishment of the new Boulevard Malesherbes, which was, for the reasons above named, and urged by the Princess Mathilde, abandoned, at all events for the present, is substituted a project we believe now concluded, for establishing a broad highway from the Park of Monceaux to the Place de l'Etoile, passing through the Faubourg St. Honoré. This will not interfere with the hotel of the Princess Mathilde, as the other would have done.

The weather is gloomy and intensely cold, and a general dulness and depression continues to reign, notwithstanding the advanced season. We suppose some galvanised galeties will be got up for the Carnival.

THE PARIS CONFERENCES.

The correspondent of Le Nord says that no particular ratification of this protocol by the Governments has been deemed necessary. Though it modifies the Treaty of Paris in some essential points, the single signature of the second Plenipotentiary of Russia has been taken as sufficient for the ratifications. The arrangement has been justified on the ground of the transitory nature of all the points of the agreement now effected. When the frontiers of Bessarabia shall have been finally settled, and the evacuation of the Black Sea and of the Danubian Principalities shall have taken place, another special convention is to be entered into by the contracting Powers, which convention will then form an integral part of the Treaty of Paris, and will be specially ratified for the purpose.

The protocol, after indicating where the frontier line will run, says:—

The work of delimitation and of handing over the territory is to be terminated on the 30th of March at latest. It is well understood that the Austrian troops must have evacuated the Principalities, and the British squadron the Straits and the Black Sea, at latest on the same date.

The convention concerning the Straits will from that time enter into full force.

The islands forming the Delta of the Danube, which article 21 of the Treaty of Paris had given to Moldavia, are again to be replaced under the sovereignty of the Porte. As the Treaty of Paris, as well as the treaties formerly concluded between Russia and the Porte are silent concerning the Island of Serpents, it has been agreed that this island is to be considered as forming part of the Delta of the Danube.

In the general interest of commerce, the Porte undertakes to maintain a lighthouse on this island for the safety of the navigation of the Danube as well as for that of the port of Odessa. The river commission, instituted by article 17 of the Treaty of Paris, will watch over the fulfilment of this engagement.

The present protocol is to have the same form as if it were clothed in the form of a convention; but it is understood that, as soon as the frontier commission shall have terminated its labours, the high contracting parties will enter into a convention, confirming the line of the frontier as the commission shall have established it and also the arrangement concerning the Delta of the Danube and the Island of Serpents.

The documents is signed Hubner, Wlewski, Cowley, Hatzfeld, Brunnow, Villamarina, Mehemmed-Djemil.

THE WAR WITH PERSIA.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

CAMP, NEAR BUSHIRE, Dec 12, 1856.

It would be unnecessary for me to detail the causes of the declaration of war with Persia. Sufficient, that the force, composed as follows, started for Bunder Abbas, viz.:—

First Brigade H.M. 64th Regiment, 20th Regiment N.I., commanded by Brigadier Stopford.

Light Brigade: 2nd European Regiment L.I., 2nd Belooch Battalion, 4th Rifle Regiment N.I., commanded by Brigadier Honner.

Artillery: 1st (Eagle) Troop Horse, Captains Gibbard and Hatch's Batteries.

Cavalry: Two squadrons 3rd Light Cavalry, Major Malet commanding; Poona Horse (400 sabres), commanded by Colone. Tapp.

Sappers and Miners. Two companies, Major J. Hill (Engineers) commanding.

In all, 5000 men. General Stalker commanding the force; Colonel Younghusband, Adjutant-General; Captain Wray, Quartermaster-General, &c., &c.

Rear-Admiral Sir Henry Locke, K.C.B., commanded the fleet, composed as follows:—Ajdaha, Punjaub, Assaye, Berenice, Victoria, Lady Falkland, Semiramis, Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy, H.E.I.C.'s steamers, and Falkland, corvette. The steamers Ghusan, Seindian, Bombay, and Victoria, belonging to the Steam Navigation Company, with thirty-two transports, conveying troops, stores, &c., left in three divisions: 1st and 2nd divisions from Bombay; 3rd and 4th, Kurrachee; 5th, Vingoria.

The Bombay portion of the fleet, transports, &c., left Bombay on the 11th October, and the whole fleet and force made Bunder Abbas, a port under the rule of the Imaum of Muscat, their rendezvous.

On the 4th October the fleet had arrived at anchor off Bushire, several of the ships touching on their way up the Persian Gulf at Bassadore, Barein, and the Island of Karak; the two former ports belong to the Imaum of Muscat, and the latter place was taken without a shot being fired, if I except the salute of twenty-one guns fired in honour of its capture. It was found to be entirely deserted by the Persians.

On the 6th ult. the fleet went round to Hallilah Bay, a beautiful harbour, though frequented only by fishing-boats, to the eastward of Bushire, distant twelve miles. By daylight of the 7th (Sunday) the gun-boats, six in number, were at their stations, to protect the landing of the troops. The only force of the enemy visible was a small party of 300 cavalry, who retired on the commencement of the firing from the boats, which took place at sunrise; and the first portion of the force—consisting of the 4th Rifles, 2nd European Light Infantry, and her Majesty's 64th Regiment—landed unopposed, with three cheers. Brigadier Honner was the first to land in Persia. The whole force was landed during the day, each man and officer carrying three days' provisions; the troops were all in excellent spirits, though the heat was intense. About four o'clock two companies of the Rifles, under Captain Maude, were dispatched to take and hold the wells, distant about two miles from the encampment. They were opposed by the enemy who retired on the approach of the column which advanced immediately we heard the firing. We remained that night at the wells. We were turned out three times during the night, but all false alarms.

Tuesday, 9th.—At daylight a body of Persians visible, amounting to about 1000 men, principally cavalry, retiring from Bushire towards the hills, apparently in the direction of Shiraz. We were unable to cut them off, though a battery of artillery was dispatched for that purpose. About eight o'clock the cavalry videttes retired before the advance of a small body of Persians. A troop of cavalry, with horse artillery, a battery of artillery, and the 4th Rifles, advanced; but the enemy had retired before they reached the crest of the hill. About nine o'clock the General decided on advancing on Ras el Bushire; accordingly we advanced right in front, in contiguous columns of regiments, covered by the troop of horse artillery, two batteries of artillery, and the cavalry, with two companies of the Rifles, and two companies of the 2nd European Light Infantry. On our approaching Ras el Bushire, the advanced guard were compelled to retire before the Arabs (i.e., the four companies of skirmishers), and the artillery commenced a heavy fire on the enemy, who retreated into a large redoubt, the rear-face of which rested on the sea. About twelve we stormed the fort, which was defended, previously to the firing of the artillery, by 1500 men. Arab-Persians, of the Tungistani tribe; but from the loss sustained by them, nearly 400, at least a thousand men must have made their escape before we crowned the ramparts of the fort. Brigadier Stopford was killed while gallantly leading on his brigade to the storm. Poor Utterson, of the 20th Regiment Native Infantry, was killed on the top of the ramparts: he was shot through the lungs, and died soon after. Poor fellow, he was a brave and gallant soldier, and is much regretted by his regiment. Lieut. Warren, 20th Regiment Native Infantry, was mortally wounded, and died on board the hospital-ship, the Result transport, the following day.

The 2nd European Light Infantry stormed the breach on the front face of the redoubt; the fire from the Arabs was very heavy, and well sustained to the last—the Arabs fighting furiously. The few who escaped by the sea face of the redoubt were cut to pieces by the cavalry, and they managed to kill poor Malet, the commanding officer of the 3rd Cavalry, and 15 troopers, before they could be exterminated. The following list comprises the killed and wounded:—

H.M 64th Regt.—1 officer (Colonel Stopford), 3 men, killed; 11 men wounded.
2nd European Light Infantry—6 men killed; 7 men wounded.
Horse Artillery—3 men wounded.
Captain Gibbard's Battery Artillery—3 men wounded.
Captain Hatch's Battery—1 man wounded.
20th Regt. Native Infantry—2 officers (Lieuts. Warren and Utterson) killed; 2 officers wounded (one severely, Capt. Hood); 10 men killed, 7 men wounded.
2nd Belooch Battalion—2 men killed (one by their own men).
3rd Light Cavalry—1 officer killed (Major Malet); 15 men killed; 10 men wounded.
Poona Horse—Colonel Tapp wounded.
4th Rifles—5 men wounded.

The steamers kept up a heavy fire from the sea on the enemy; but from the appearance of the interior of the fort, after the storm, it appears to have had but little effect.

Wednesday, 9th.—At sunrise advanced on Bushire; arriving before the town at about one p.m. The cavalry engaged during the march with small parties of the enemy; cutting off about fifty men, part of whom were made prisoners. I forgot to mention that the fleet moved round to Bushire during the night and commenced a tremendous cannonade on the town, which was returned by the enemy from a heavy battery on the sea. Our range, however, was so much greater than theirs that their fire had little effect on the ships, as they were soon moved out of range of the enemy's guns. The rigging of the Semiramis was cut to pieces, however, hardly a rope being left standing. She only received two shots in her hull. The Victoria also was injured, but I believe not a single man was killed, a few only wounded. On our drawing up in line to commence action a flag of truce was sent up to the masthead of the Assaye, the flagship, and, accordingly, firing ceased.

The enemy did not attempt to fire on us, and, on the arrival of the Assistant Political Agent from the flagship, a flag of truce was sent towards the gates of the town; and, ultimately, the Governor of Bushire and his staff advanced to meet the attaché, Major Taylor (from Teheran, who joined the force two days previously from Bagdad), Captain Rigby, &c., &c., by whom he was conducted to the General, and the unconditional surrender of the town was formally demanded. The Governor was also informed that half an hour would be allowed for consideration, at the expiration of which, should the place not surrender, the fire would recommence. The Governor (Derza Bez) accordingly returned, and the whole force advanced to within 500 yards of the wall, the horse artillery advancing on the gates. However, within the half hour, the Governor returned and gave himself up as prisoner of war, surrendering the town; and the British flag, within an hour, was flying over the walls of Bushire. The line now advanced, the infantry regiments and artillery laid down their arms, and were then permitted to escape. Fifty-six guns, principally long field-pieces, were taken, besides the muskets, &c. Shot to say, all the arms, even the large guns, bore the Company's mark! About 2000 cavalry had made their escape previous to our advance, carrying off their horses, &c. I have omitted to add that a strong Martello Tower, defended by two guns, and surrounded by earthworks, was taken unopposed, the garrison having been shelled out from the ships; the tower is now occupied by the General and staff, and the Governor of Bushire, as a prisoner of war. The town appears to have suffered much from the fire of the ships; and the loss sustained by the enemy amounts to nearly 500 men. Bushire contains 10,000 inhabitants, besides the army, artillery, &c., which amounted, a few days previously to our arrival, between 4000 and 5000 men. The 64th and 20th Regiments now occupy Bushire, the remainder of the force being encamped outside; and we hope in a day or two to receive our tents, &c., for the cold at night is very intense, and we have now been six days without them, exposed to sun and cold and heavy dews, and on salt provisions—men and officers. We now remain here pending the answer of the Shah. I fancy he will be rather surprised to hear of the surrender of the town of Bushire.

This is written in the sun, with my knee for a writing-desk. The despatches leave to-day, and I have only just time to send this hastily-written account.

It is reported that the Shah has decided to make peace upon the terms proposed. The Morning Post says:—

We believe we may state that official information has reached our Government of the probability of the Court of Teheran agreeing to our demands. The Turkish Minister at that capital has sent a despatch to his Government, informing it to that effect. It is also said that, in consequence of the favourable disposition which the Persian Government "decided" to make peace upon the English terms. On its reaching Constantinople this intelligence was immediately forwarded by telegraph by Lord Stratford, and its authenticity may be relied on.

We may therefore hope for a speedy settlement of the Persian difficulty. At the same time we need hardly point out, after our recent experience in the theory and practice of peace-making, that there is sufficient distrust between a determination to make peace and the actual accomplishment of that object to warrant us in not being over sanguine. The Court of Persia may change its mind, and, after the expedition, immediately afterwards of its success. On finding the force to be less than was anticipated, and that it is not yet advancing into the country, the Persian mind may change. We do not suppose this—we only point it out. We ourselves think that the capture of Bushire will probably be the beginning and the end of the Persian war.

THE WAR IN CHINA

The advices from Hong-Kong by the last Overland Mail come down to the 16th of December.

An extract to the Hong-Kong Register, of Dec. 16, details the destruction of the factories at Canton:

During the conflagration the Dutch Folly Fort was throwing shells and rockets into the city. Not to attack us, made—the Chinese contenting themselves with burning the empty houses, by which their own people will be the greatest sufferers. The Oriental Bank was in full blaze, the Agra and Mercantile Banks burned down, and the Consulate still standing but expected to go, with all the remaining buildings in the factories. The fire commenced behind the premises of Messrs. Dent and Co., and all the houses fronting the Garden Gardens, except those of Russell and Co., and Wetmore and Co., burned; the two last named were saved for the time.

We are sorry to learn that the fire has been accompanied with loss of life. Mr. O. J. Lane, of the Consulate, having been killed by the blowing up of the passage, and Dr. Winchester, Vice-Consul, slightly bruised.

The Heroes.

We hear this day of one terrible consequence of the present condition of Canton. Yeh, it seems, has been concentrating there all the troops ordinarily distributed through the surrounding country; and some of the districts from which the garrisons have been withdrawn have been conquered even by thousands of Hak-ka men. Within the last three weeks the magisterial districts of Sin-hwui, Kwa-ping, and Hoh-shan, have suffered fearfully. Some fifty towns and villages are said to have been sacked and burnt; the inhabitants massacred without distinction of age or sex; and it is computed that some 50,000 people have been turned out of house and home.

The Straits Times and Singapore Journal, of Dec. 23, states that its latest advices from Canton mention that "the British were pouring shot and shell into the city—which place, it was expected, would be completely destroyed in a few days."

ORGANISATION OF THE PRINCIPALITIES.

The firman convoking the Divan ad hoc, which is to represent the wishes of the population of Wallachia upon the definitive political organisation of that Principality, has been published. It prescribes that all boyards and sons of boyards, thirty years of age, possessing 200 falkhes of land, shall assemble and elect in each district two deputies to the Divan, who must be owners of 400 falkhes of land. All other proprietors, possessing not less than ten falkhes of land, shall choose in each district five electors, who are to elect one deputy to the Divan. The peasants of each commune are to choose two delegates, who will meet together in each district and appoint electors, by whom a deputy to the Divan will be elected; and these district deputies of the peasants will be paid a compensation for their journey and their stay at Bucharest. Four city members will be elected by the capital, and two, or one, by the other towns. The candidates must be thirty years old, natives or legally naturalised, and not subject to any foreign protection. Town deputies must either possess houses of a certain value, or be members of a literal profession, merchants having a patent of the third class, members of academies or literary and scientific institutions recognised by the State, or delegates of the different corporations.

THE BLACK SEA.

A despatch from Constantinople, dated Jan. 19, says the British steamers have quitted the Euxine, the Russians having evacuated Serpents' Island. The Lebanon disturbances have been calmed. The Circassians were forming three armies in Abasia, Leghistan, and Kabarda. The Russians were concentrating on the River Kour.

AMERICA.

By the Niagara, which arrived at Liverpool on Monday last, we have American news to the 14th inst. The alteration of the tariff seems to be the leading topic of discussion. In the House of Representatives a bill for reducing the duty on imports had been taken up in committee. Mr. Humphrey Marshall, in introducing the bill, gave notice in general terms that the committee contemplated bringing down the high ad valorem duties on clothing or raising the low ones. Mr. Florence had given notice of an amendment—viz., That all goods or articles of manufacture unfinished, and known as goods in the grease, of which the tissues are combed wool, and of which the chain and filling are wool, such as marinoes, mousselines de laine, cashmeres, and satins; and those the tissues of which and the chain is of silk, and the filling of wool, such as barèges and satin, be admitted on paying a duty of ten per cent ad valorem. Mr. Morrill offered an amendment, that any wool or hair of the alpaca, goat, &c., changed in character for the purpose of evading the duty, should, if reduced fifteen cents per lb., or less, be subjected to a duty of thirty per cent.

Advices from Kansas report that the Free State Legislature met at Topeka on the 6th inst., and adjourned until next day. Governor Robinson had resigned. Lieut.-Governor Roberts was in the territory, but failed to attend, and much dissatisfaction prevailed in consequence. A United States' Deputy Marshal had arrested seven members of the Free State Legislature on a writ issued by Judge Cato; over thirty persons were attached to the writ. The prisoners were taken to Tecumseh for trial.

Advices from San Juan del Norte to the 22nd December report that no tidings had been received of Walker for some days previously. Scott had quarrelled with him and stopped running his boats, and Walker had seized for his own use all the steamers on the lake and rivers.

The church of Guadaloupe was still held by the Americans, who refused to surrender, though destitute and subsisting on grasshead. They were to be attacked immediately, after which the bulk of the allied army would proceed to operate with General Costa against San Juan and Virgin Bay. The loss of the Filibusters since Nov. 24 was stated at 200; that of the allies small. Private letters state that the Indians at Omatere had risen against Walker, and killed fifteen Filibusters. Walker, with 150 men, had attempted to retake Granada, but was repulsed. Canas, the commander of the Costa Ricans forces against Walker, was near or in Rivas on the 12th, with 5.0 men. Walker had 400 men at St. George, a mile or two from Rivas, and Canas wrote that he should attack the Americans the next day, unless Walker took the initiative. The whole force against the Filibusters now in the field according to Costa Rica papers, is about 2000 men 500 more from Salvador and from Costa Rica would enter Nicaragua immediately. Walker's whole force was not reckoned to exceed 600.

THE PERSIAN AMBASSADOR'S RECEPTION.—The Persian Ambassador was received by the French Emperor on Saturday last, at a public audience, when he presented his credentials. To the speech of the Ambassador the Emperor made the following reply:—"Monsieur l'Ambassadeur,—I am happy that your Sovereign has charged you to bring me his congratulations. When the war broke out in the East I thought to renew our former relations with Persia, and her neutrality was not useless to us. I now congratulate myself on the treaty of commerce concluded between our two countries; as commercial relations, firmly established, always cement the friendship of nations. It is with regret that I heard of the war which has broken out between you and one of my most intimate allies; but I make most ardent wishes that your mission to this portion of the globe may hasten the return of lasting peace. I thank you for the flattering things you have said to me for France, and for the Prince Imperial; and I beg you to be the interpreter of my full sentiments of benevolence towards you. The Ambassador handed to the Emperor the Royal Order of Persia, and presents for the Empress and Prince Imperial."

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—The Queen has intimated her intention not to open Parliament in person. The Speech from the Throne upon the reassembling of Parliament will, therefore, be delivered by Lords Commissioners on Tuesday, February 3. The Address, in answer to the Speech from the Throne, will be moved in the Lords by the Earl of Cork, and, we believe, will be seconded by Earl Cowper. Both these young noblemen have but lately succeeded, at an early age, to their family honours. The Address of the Commons will be moved by Sir John Dashwood King, member for the borough of Tamworth, and seconded by Sir Andrew Agnew, Bart., member for Wigtonshire.

PARLIAMENTARY DINNER PARTIES.—The Ministerial dinner parties on the opening of the Session will be given by Viscount Palmerston and Earl Granville to the supporters of Government, and in the House. The former noble Lord will entertain his colleagues and those members of the Lower House who hold places in the Queen's household, together with the mover and seconder of the Address, and a large number of members holding office in different departments of the Government. Lord Granville will receive his colleagues in the Upper House, noblemen holding office in her Majesty's household, the mover and seconder of the Address, and also a large party of Peers, supporters of the present Administration. Both banquets will be State dinner.

THE INCOME-TAX.—DEPUTATION TO THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.—On Tuesday afternoon a deputation waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at his official residence in Downing-street, for the purpose of pressing upon his attention the necessity of a removal of the Income-tax upon incomes under £150 and under. The deputation consisted of Dr Challice, of Bermondsey, Mr. Stratton, Mr Underwood, and other gentlemen, who are members of the association under whose auspices a meeting was held last week at the London Tavern. The deputation was introduced by Mr. Stratton, who pointed out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the great inconveniences felt by persons with limited incomes from the pressure of the tax. He begged of him to call the Chancellor to consider whether it would not be possible to relieve persons entirely who had incomes under £150 a year, and in all cases to abandon the present first class of £100 and under. The deputation then discussing with the Chancellor the subject of poor-rates and various other matters, thanked him for receiving the deputation, and left without receiving any reply on the specific question on which they had visited him for consultation.

THE NEW BISHOP OF LONDON.—On Saturday Dr. Archibald Campbell Tait, the new Bishop of London, appeared in the Court of Queen's Bench, before Lord Campbell, Mr Justice Coleridge, Mr Justice Wightman, and Mr. Justice Crompton, when the oaths of supremacy, allegiance, and abjuration were administered to the right rev. Prelate by the Queen's Remembrancer. His Lordship, having subscribed the oaths, took his leave of the Judges and the Court.

MERCANTILE LAW CONFERENCE. A conference on the subject of the Mercantile Law was held on Wednesday last at Willis's Rooms, under the presidency of Lord Brougham. Amongst the gentlemen present were Lord Stanley, M.P., Sir Erskine Perry, M.P., Mr. Apsley Pellatt, M.P., Mr George Ridley, M.P., Mr. Wickham, M.P., Mr. Crauford, M.P., Mr. C. Russell, Liverpool; Mr. E. Benner, Liverpool Law Society; Mr. J. Wilson, Vice-President of the Liverpool Guardian Society for the Protection of Trade; Messrs. Hassell, Phillips, and Wells, Hull Chamber of Commerce; Mr. L. Briton, Secretary to the Bristol Chamber of Commerce; Messrs Crosthwaite, F. Codd, John Jameson, and Thomas Firn, Dublin Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Henry Brown, Mayor of Bradford; Mr. John Darlington, Secretary to the Bradford Chamber of Commerce; Messrs. Kitchley and Saunders, Kidderminster; Mr. S. Ayrton, Leeds; Messrs. Turner, Entwistle, Taylor, and Fleming, Commercial Association, Manchester; Mr. Lea, Warrington; Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Richard Graves, Mayor of Warwick; Mr. S. S. Lloyd, Birmingham Chamber of Commerce; Mr J. Mitchell, Louth; Mr. T. T. Paget, President of the Leicester Trade Protection Society; and Mr. Thomas M'Clure, Belfast Chamber of Commerce. There was also a large attendance of the members of the legal profession. The Chairman addressed the meeting at some length on the subject of Mercantile Law. A report was then read detailing the proceedings of the society, the changes which had been made, and the alterations proposed in the Mercantile Law since the last conference, after which papers were read by the Lord Chancellor, Mr. Commerce, and Mr. Commissioner Ayrton, on the administration of the Bankruptcy Law; and also a paper by Mr. Crauford, on the Judgments Execution Bill.

MEETING OF TICKET-OF-LEAVE MEN.—A meeting of ticket-of-leave men took place on Tuesday evening at Farringdon Hall, Snowhill. The arrangements for this singular gathering were made by Mr. Henry Mayhew, at the request of the Earl of Carnarvon, who was announced to preside, and who was anxious that on the eve of the reassembling of Parliament, where this subject will be fully canvassed, our legislators should have the benefit of whatever light such a meeting might afford, before approaching so important a discussion. The muster on the occasion comprised from seventy to eighty of the cases especially invited, who were admitted on presenting their respective tickets of leave at the door; and in order to allay any distrust which might prevent them from responding to the summons the police were rigorously excluded, as well from the entrance and immediate vicinity of the hall, as from the interior. The proceedings were advertised to commence at half-past seven o'clock, but a delay of three-quarters of an hour occurred, during which a few stragglers dropped in, swelling the entire assemblage to perhaps between eighty or ninety. Lord Carnarvon took the chair, and on or near the platform were Mr. H. Mayhew, the Rev. Mr. Pert, Mr Bench, Mr. Wyld, Dr. Mackay, and some dozen or fifteen other gentlemen interested in the reformation of our criminal population. Several ticket-of-leave men addressed the meeting, and they spoke in strong terms of the difficulty they had to obtain honest employment. One man said he was willing to work for 2s a day to-morrow if anybody would engage him, and that sum was as little as he could well live upon. The way in which his kind friends had "lent him a hand" was to set the police to hunt him down without cause. His married sister had her house nearly broken into, and when the police went to inquire about it his mother told them, "Oh, I have an uncle who is a housebreaker." At the close of the meeting the Chairman asked for a show of hands to ascertain whether the men would prefer to have a ticket of leave in England or a ticket of leave in the colonies, when they all signified their choice in the latter alternative.

REBUILDING OF THE ROYAL PAVILION THEATRE.—On Monday morning permission was granted by the lord of the manor for the district of St Mary Whitechapel, to the ground landlord for the rebuilding of the Pavilion Theatre, Whitechapel-road, which was destroyed by fire about two years since.

OFFICIAL APPOINTMENTS.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed Mr. G. D. Bevan, of the Middle Temple, to be Judge of the County Court of Cornwall, in the room of Mr. G. G. Kekewich, deceased. The Rev. Sydney Turner, of the Philanthropic school at Red-hill, has been appointed Inspector of Prisons for service connected with the reformatories for juvenile offenders.

MONUMENT TO MEDICAL OFFICERS OF THE ARMY WHO LOST THEIR LIVES DURING THE LATE WAR.—A special meeting of the committee appointed to carry out the above design assembled at the Army Medical Board, Waterloo-place, on Saturday, the 17th inst., when the sum of £333 is was announced to have been received, which, with a few exceptions, had been subscribed by the army medical officers themselves, the sum of £317 having been remitted by the survivors while serving in the Crimea, and the residue of £198 has been since contributed in England. A supplemental list will hereafter be printed containing the names of contributors and the amount subscribed, in addition to the list which has already been circulated. Subscriptions continue to be received by Messrs. M'Gregor, Army Agents, and by Mr. John Winteridge, at the Army Medical Board.

COURT OF ARCHES.—IMPORTANT DECISION.—In the Court of Queen's Bench, Guildhall, on Saturday, before Sir John Dodson, the Dean of the Arches Court, to state a case in a way a nuisance should not be continued, the question arising from the decision of the Archbishop of Canterbury and his assessors, was made absolute.

[illegible] METROPOLIS.—The deaths registered in London, which in the two previous weeks had been 1911 and 1191, rose in the week that ended last Saturday to 1216. Although the rate of mortality has been rising lately, it is still below [illegible]. Last week the births of 904 boys and 888 girls, in all 1792 children, were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1847-56 the average number was 1553.

THE PROSPECTS OF THE BRITISH [illegible] CREDITORS.—At the first meeting of the creditors of [illegible] Linkater, [illegible] Mr. Follett, the solicitor for the creditors, stated that the creditors' solicitors had been in communication with the assignees of the property of Mr. Humphrey [illegible] with the assignees have at their disposal [illegible] and it was expected that by the end of February they would make another dividend [illegible] and he was glad to say that time that the exertions which are now being made for a general arrangement will be successful, and that there may be a close to all matters connected with the Royal British Bank.

THE UNEMPLOYED WORKMEN AND THE POOR-LAW GUARDIANS.—On Monday last some 200 persons marched in a body from Lambeth Workhouse to Lambeth Police Court, and forwarded a document to Mr. Hall, the sitting magistrate, in which they stated that they had applied to the parish for casual relief and been refused. They now appealed to him for advice as to what course they ought to take. Mr. Elliott desired that one or two of the men might be elected by the crowd as their advocates or spokesmen, and in a few minutes a deputation of three made their appearance in the court. One of them, Charles Fletcher, a journeyman painter, entered the witness-box, and, addressing the magistrate, said that, agreeably to the instructions of the secretary of the committee of the unemployed working men who had met in Smithfield some days ago, he, and a number of persons who were, as well as himself, settled in that parish, for relief; but it was refused them, unless they worked three hours for half a pound of bread. This they refused, though none of them had been without food since the day before, for this reason that, if compelled to do three hours' work in the workhouse for the small amount of relief afforded them, they should be spending the time that it would be necessary to look out for work elsewhere, and this would be exceedingly detrimental to their getting work. In reply to Mr. Elliott, Fletcher said that the regular relief had been offered to the applicants at Clerkenwell and other parishes. Mr Elliott here directed Coster, one of the warrant officers, to accompany the applicants and the party to Lambeth Workhouse and to request the relieving officer to take down the names of the applicants and give them such temporary relief as the necessities of themselves and their families required until they could attend the board, and have the regular relief inquired into and properly attended to. Coster at once obeyed the magistrate's directions, and on his return informed Mr. Elliott that on reaching the workhouse he found the board of Guardians were then sitting, and he at once presented to the board room and informed the chairman and the members of the board of the message he had been sent with by his worship. The board at once consented to hear the application or complaint of a deputation of the applicants, as they represented themselves, and he (Coster) took a message to the parties to that effect, but they one and all declined. Mr. Jarrel, one of the relieving officers, also offered the parties, in his presence, tickets for labour in the workhouse, and for which labour they would have been paid according to their necessities and the number of their families, but they refused to accept them, and marched off in a body. Mr. Elliott said that he was not surprised or disappointed at the result, believing, as he did, that the object of the parties was more display than actual want, or a desire to seek parochial assistance.

THE DOUBLE MURDER IN WALWORTH.—On Monday last Mrs. Bacon made a fuller confession of the guilt of her husband, but it does not differ widely from that which she made on the previous Wednesday at Lambeth Police Court. She says that it was after destroying the life of the younger child that her husband attacked her, and not only attempted to cut her throat, but inflicted several scars on it. She repeats that she got hold of him by the waist of the right hand in which he held the knife with her hands, and prevented him reaching her throat. She further states that, as soon as her husband could release himself from her hold, he drew a rope from his pocket, and drew it round her neck, endeavouring to prevent her making a noise, and, forcing her on her bed, rushed out of the room. In confirmation of her assertion on this point it is said that, when taken to Horsemonger-lane gaol on the Tuesday evening (the following day), the matron of that prison distinctly noticed a livid mark round the neck, such as would be produced by a rope or some hard signture tied tightly round it, and a streak or two of blood of a singular character as to induce her to call the attention of the prison surgeon to it. On Wednesday last Bacon underwent an examination, and was remanded till next week.

III. CAMEL-DRIVERS' ENCAMPMENT. IV. TRAVELLERS' ENCAMPMENT.

THE long day's journey has at length come to an end. As the sun nears the west, the hot uncomfortable wind gradually assumes a milder form. Large banks of sand-hillocks throw out their welcome shades, and the chief of the caravan looks earnestly around him for some one spot more suitable than the rest of the vast wilderness for the night's bivouac. At length, in a species of valley, whose confines are formed by mimic sand-hills, we come across a group of stunted palm-trees, more than half buried in accumulating sand. One tree, more stunted than the rest, has been overtaken by the gathering deluge of dust, and nought but a few of its branches remain above ground. There are a few acacias, and a stray bush or two of camel-thorn, as if to something so cheering in the proximity of vegetation that it is resolved on by all parties to halt here for the night. The camels are unladen, and most of them, weary with the day's work, lie about in uncouth and grotesque attitudes. Some few, delighted to be eased of their burden, go stalking about the neighbourhood in the vain search for green leaves or prickly pear bushes. The camel-drivers fasten the neck containing the camel's evening meal round the animal's head, and then betake themselves to the enjoyment of a pipe or a nargheley. In the picture before us two old worthies, to whom the spot has been familiar from infancy, are inhaling with gusto the fragrant smoke of their respective pipes, waiting patiently the arrival of their herbaceous fare, who are busily occupied in helping to set up the travellers' tents, before partaking of their frugal evening meal, and stretching out on their sheepskins for the night. Nearer still is one of their number, who, completely overcome by the heat and fatigue of the day, has sunk into a deep sleep, with nothing but a hard stone (like Jacob of old) for his pillow. The two nearest figures in the group are evidently native travellers—one of whom, pipe and tobacco-bag in hand, is meditating on what next to do, deep in smoke; while his weary companion has sunk into a deep repose, his head supported against a pile of travelling-bags containing his own and his comrade's personal property.

The night is far advanced, and the weary travellers and their servants are wrapt in deep sleep. Intense solitude reigns around. The white light of the sickly moon shines upon the travellers' encampment, which consists of about half-a-dozen shadirs, or tents. One tent is set aside as a sleeping apartment for the lady and gentleman; another answers the same purpose for the servants; another for the drago-man, or interpreter (a very consequential personage in a traveller's train of followers); another to cook in; and one (generally the largest tent) is fitted up as a dining and sitting room. Here many of the camel-drivers congregate when all the rest have retired to rest, partly to guard over the luggage in case some stray Arab Bedouins should be on their track, partly for the sake of shelter from the heavy night dews. These sing and tell tales during the early part of the night; and one of their number alternately, gun in hand, keeps watch outside the tent doors. Their long spears, towering high in the air, have been negligently stuck into the ground, and so have many of their poles bearing flags. Hanging from the tent are the leather water-bags the most indispensable treasures of the desert wanderer. A few wickerwork cages containing fowls and partridges are left near the tent doors; and against one of these, the barrel of his long gun resting on his shoulder, is leaning the wary watchman, squatted in a fashion wholly incomprehensible to an Englishman. Hanging from a little stick with a crook at the end of it is the paper "funnarl," or lantern, which folds into a convenient size when not in active service, and in which a small wax candle faintly glimmers. Near the funnarl are two of the baggage-camels: one endeavouring to disentangle his mouth from the long-since empty sack the other indolently rubbing its head against the bony shoulders of its companion. In the distance are two or three camels that have strayed from the encampment, chewing the cud of discontent in the utter absence of all vegetable matter. The morning approaches, of which two or three unhappy cooks cooped up in the baskets before alluded to give ample warning. The tents are struck, the camels laden, and the party resumes its march. And this, with very little variation to the monotony of the thing, is the every-day routine in the desert.

TRAVELLERS' ENCAMPMENT IN THE DESERT.

TREE-CLIMBING CRABS.

FEW who look at the vast quantities of crabs, lobsters, sea crayfish, shrimps, and prawns, which are so temptingly and abundantly displayed in the shops of our fishmongers, consider them in any other light than as delicacies for the table. At present we desire only to touch upon certain strange species, the existence of which even is not generally known, and thus throw an interest around the whole tribe. First let us take a cursory glance at the Crustaceans, as the naturalist terms them—that is, crabs, lobsters, and similar species.

Crabs and lobsters are strange creatures: strange in their configuration; strange in the transmutations which they exhibit from the egg to maturity; strange in the process they undergo of casting off, each only their hirkling-places, others, tripping with a quick sidelong movement over the beach, alarmed by the advance of an unwelcome intruder. Some of these Crustaceans are exclusively tenants of the water, have feet formed like paddles, for swimming, and never venture on land; others seem to love the air and sunshine, and enjoy an excursion, not without hopes of finding an acceptable repast, over the oozy sands; some, equally fond of the shore and the shallow water, appropriate to themselves the shells of periwinkles, whelks, &c., and there live in a sort of castle, which they drag about with them on their excursions, changing it for a larger, not without serious scrutiny, as they increase in measure of growth.

The Crustaceans afford interesting objects for the consideration of those who delight in the study of natural history; especially those of the warmer latitudes of the globe. They vary in size, from microscopic animalcules to the gigantic King Crab: to the former, the luminosity of the ocean, or of the foam before the prows of vessels, is to a great extent attributable, each minute creature glowing with phosphoric radiance Certain crabs, especially in the West Indies, are almost exclusively terrestrial, visiting the sea only at given periods, for the deposition of their eggs. These crabs, carrying in their gill-chambers sufficient water for the purpose of respiration, live in burrows, and traverse considerable tracts of land in the performance of migratory journeys. Of these some, as the Violet Crab, are esteemed exquisite delicacies.

Of one of the Burrowing Crabs Cuvier thus writes:—"The animal closes the entrance of its burrow, which is situated near the margin of the sea, or in marshy grounds, with its largest claw. These burrows are cylindrical, oblique, very deep, and very close to each other, but generally each burrow is the exclusive habitation of a single individual. The habit which these crabs have of holding their large claw elevated in advance of the body, as if making a sign of beckoning to some one, has obtained for them the name of Calling Crabs. There is a species observed by Mr. Bose in South Carolina, which passes the three months of the winter in its retreat without once quitting it, and which never goes to the sea except at the epoch of egg-laying." The same observations apply to the Chevalier Crabs (so called from the celerity with which they traverse the ground). These are found in Africa, and along the borders of the Mediterranean.

Some crabs, truly social, as the Vaulted Crab of the Moluccas, have the power of drawing back their limbs and concealing them in a furrow, which they closely fit; and thus, in imitation of tortoises, which retracts its feet and head within its shell, they secure themselves, when alarmed, from the attack of enemies. Other aquatic species have the limbs adapted for clinging to weeds and other marine objects. Of these, some have the two or four hinder pair of limbs so placed as to appear to spring from the back; they terminate in a sharp hook, by means of which the animal attaches itself to the valves of shells, fragments of coral, &c., which it draws over its body, and thus lurks in concealment. Allied in some respects to the Hermit or Soldier Crabs, which tenant empty shells, and to which we have briefly alluded, is one which from its habits and manners is certainly to be placed amongst the most extraordinary of its race. The Hermit Crabs are voracious, and feed on animal substances, and this is the character of the Crustaceans in general. On the contrary, the Crab, or rather Lobster Crab—for it takes an intermediate place between them—is more delicate in its appetite, and feeds upon fruits, to obtain which it climbs up certain trees, at the foot of which it makes a burrow. The species in question is the Purse Crab or Robber Crab (Birgus latro) of Amboyna, and other islands in the South Pacific Ocean. It is probable that there are more than one species, but voyagers have not attended to nice discrimination

The first naturalist who placed upon record the habits of the Purse Crab was Herbst; and to his account Rumphius, Seba, Linnæus, and Cuvier refer. The latter observes that, "according to a popular belief among the Indians, the animal feeds on the nuts of the cocoa-tree, and that it makes its excursions during the night." He gives fissures in the rocks, or holes in the ground, as its places of retreat.

That the accounts of the early writers and travellers should have been received with incredulity is not surprising, nor that the statements of the natives should have been deemed almost unworthy of serious consideration. The truth of these details has been, however, within the last few years abundantly confirmed in all their essentials. MM. Quoy and Gaimard assure us that several individuals of this species were fed by them for many months on cocoa-nuts alone—a circumstance commented upon by Professor Owen, when a specimen of this crab was laid before one of the scientific meetings of the Zoological Society, with additional information from Mr. Cuming, in whose fine collection of Crustacea, shells, &c., from the Islands of the South Pacific, several specimens were preserved. According to this enterprising voyager and naturalist, these crabs are to be found in great abundance at Lord Hood's Island, in the Pacific. He there frequently met with them on the road; and states that, on being disturbed, they instantly assumed a defensive attitude, making a violent snapping with their powerful claws, or pincers, and continued this snapping as they retreated backwards. They climb a species of palm (Pandanus odoratissimus), and eat a small kind of cocoa-nut that grows thereon. They live at the roots of the trees, and not in the holes of rocks, and they are a favourite food among the natives. Such is the substance of Mr. Cuming's account; to which we shall now add a most interesting passage from Mr. Darwin's ("Researches in Geology and Natural History"), relative to the habits of these crabs, as observed by him in the Keeling Islands, or Cocos Islands, situated in the Indian Ocean, about 600 miles distant from the coast of Sumatra. In these islands, of coral formation, the cocoa-nut tree so prevails as to appear, at a first glance, to compose the whole wood, but five or six other kinds are also to be seen, and one of large size. Here the Great Purse Crab is abundant. Mr. Darwin writes as follows:—

I have before alluded to a crab which lives on the cocos-nuts; it is very common on all parts of the dry land, and grows to a monstrous size. It is closely allied to, or is identical with, the Birgus latro. This crab has its front pair of legs terminated by very strong and heavy pincers, and the last pair by others which are narrow and weak. It would at first be thought quite impossible for a crab to open a strong cocoa-nut, covered with the husk; but Mr. Liesk assures me that he has repeatedly seen the operation effected. The crab begins by tearing away the husk, fibre by fibre, and always from that end under which the three eye-holes are situated. When this is completed the crab commences hammering with its heavy claws on one of these eye-holes till an opening is made. Then, turning its body, by the aid of its posterior and narrow pair of pincers it extracts the white albuminous substance. I think this as curious a case as I ever heard of, and likewise of adaptation in structure between two objects apparently so remote from each other in the scheme of nature as a crab and a cocoa-nut tree. The Birgus is diurnal in its habits; but it is said to pay every night a visit to the sea for the purpose of moistening its gills.

THE ROBBER CRAB (BIRGUS LATRO).

These gills, we may here observe, are very peculiar, and scarcely fill up more than a tenth of the chamber in which they are situated, and which, doubtless, acts as a reservoir for water, to serve during the animals' excursions over the dry and heated land. The young are hatched and live for some time on the coast. At this period of existence we cannot suppose that cocoa-nuts form any part of their diet; most probably soft saccharine grasses, tender fruits, and animal matters constitute their food, until they attain to a certain degree of size and strength.

Mr. Darwin continues:—

The adult crabs inhabit deep burrows, which they excavate beneath the roots of trees; and here they accumulate surprising quantities of the picked fibres of the cocoa-nut husk, on which they rest as on a bed. The Malays sometimes take advantage of their labours by collecting the coarse fibrous substance and using it as junk.

These crabs are very good to eat; moreover, under the tail of the larger ones there is a great mass of fat, which when melted yields as much as a quart bottleful of limpid oil.

It has been stated by some authors that the Birgus latro crawls up the cocoa-nut trees, for the purpose of stealing the nuts. I very much doubt the possibility of this; but with Pandanus (to which Mr. Cuming refers as being ascended by this crab) the task would be very much easier. I understand from Mr. Liesk that on these islands the Birgus lives only on the nuts which fall to the ground.

It may at first appear than Mr. Cuming's and Mr. Darwin's respective accounts of the non-climbing of this animal, on the one side, and of its actually climbing trees on the other, are contradictory. The height of the stem of the cocoa-nut tree, its circumference, and comparative external smoothness, would certainly prove insurmountable, or at least very serious, obstacles to the most ambitious and most greedy Birgus, however large and strong it might be. But these difficulties are by no means so formidable in the plants of the Pandanus tribe—a group composed of arborescent or bushy species, with long, thin, rigid, sword-shaped leaves resembling those of the pine-apple, usually arranged in a manner so obviously spiral, that they are commonly called Screw-pines. In the genus Pandanus (a word derived from the Malay Pandang) the leaves decidedly present this spiral mode of arrangement. The Pandanus odoratissimus is celebrated for the fragrance of its essence, and is referred to by the Sanscrit poets under the name of Ketake. It is the Keora and Ketjee of the Hindus, and the Kaze of the Arabs. Oil impregnated with the essence of its flowers and water distilled from them are highly esteemed both for their odour and medicinal qualities. In the peninsula of India this species is called the Caldera bush; and Dr. Roxburgh informs us that it is from the tender white leaves of the flowers, particularly of the male flowers, that the essence is obtained. The lower pulpy part of the drupes is sometimes eaten, as is also the terminal bud, together with the white base of the long acute leaves, either boiled or raw. It forms an excellent hedge, but occupies an inconvenient degree of room. The leaves are composed of tough white longitudinal fibres, well adapted for the fabrication of matting, and cordage for the manufacture of sacks and similar articles. An allied and very fragrant species is common in Tahiti, where it is called the Wharra tree; others are found in the Mauritius, where they are known as the Vaquois plant. Long roots are thrown off from the sides of the stems of these screw pines for the purpose of holding them more steadily in the loose sandy or coral-formed soil in which they grow. The fruit consists of a mass of seed berries or ovaries, collected into a tuberculated head. In some species they are dry and fibrous, in others fleshy and succulent.

This slight description of the general character of the Pandanus, or screw-pine, will suffice to show that the ascent of these arborescent plants, having the stem furnished with a rigging of cord-like roots, and bearing a multitude of firm, long, and spirally-arranged leaves, will be by no means a work of difficulty, as would necessarily be that of the tall, featherytopped cocoa-nut tree, destitute of all available points of aid or support. Hence the contradiction in the two accounts referred to is seeming, and not real, and both statements are easily reconciled. We may here observe that fine specimens of the Birgus are to be seen in the British Museum.

That among such animals as the Crab tribes, a tree-climbing species is to be found is certainly curious, but it is not without a parallel among fishes. Among these latter, many leave the water, some even for a long period, and perform oviparal journeys, aided in their progress by the structure of their fins. In these fishes the gills and gill-chambers are constructed for the retention of water for a considerable time, so as to suffice for the necessary degree of respiration. In our own country we may mention the eel, which, as we know from personal experience, often voluntarily quits the river or lake, and wanders during the night over the adjacent meadows, probably in quest of dew-worms.

But the marshes of India and China present us with fishes much more decidedly terrestrial, and which (some of them, at least) were known to the ancients.

Among these are several members of a genus called Ophiocephalus (from their snake-like form). These fishes, having an elongated and cylindrical body, creep on land to great distances from their native waters. The boatmen of India often keep these fishes for a long time out of their true element, for the sake of diverting themselves and others by their terrestrial movements, and children may be often seen pursuing this sort of sport. Of these terrestrial or land-haunting fishes the most remarkable is the Pannei-eri (tree-climber), as it is called in Tranquebar. This fish inhabits India, the Indian islands, and various parts of China, Chusan, &c.; living in marshes, and feeding on aquatic insects, worms, &c. Not only does this fish wander on land, but, according Daldorf a Danish gentleman, who, in 1797, communicated an account of its habits to the Linnean Society (Trans. Linn., iii., p. 62), it mounts up the bushes or low palms to some elevation. This gentleman states that he has himself observed it in the act of ascending palm-trees near the marshes, and had taken it at a height of no less than five feet, measured from the level of the adjacent water. Its effects its ascent by means of its pectoral and under fins, aided by the action of the tail and the spines which border the gill covers. It is by the same agency that it traverses the land. The statement of M. Daldorf is corroborated by M. John, also a Danish observer, to whom we are indebted for the knowledge of its name in Tranquebar, which alludes to its arboreal proceedings.

It is true that many other naturalists, and among them Reinwardt, Leschenault, Hamilton, Buchanan, and others, who have observed the habits of this fish in its native regions, while they concur in describing its terrestrial journeys, and its living for a long time out of water, either omit to mention, or mention with doubt, its asserted essays at tree-climbing. This, however, proves nothing: for example, the Birgus, as we have seen, certainly climbs the screw-pines (Pandanus), as Mr. Cuming testifies. But, were we to be guided solely by the opinion of Mr. Darwin, which, as far as the cocoa-nut tree is concerned, is no doubt correct—we should be apt to infer, too hastily, that the assertions which have been made as to its climbing at all are totally fallacious. In the case of the fish we have its native Tamul appellation, and the assertions of those who have published accounts of what they have themselves seen. This fish is the Perca scandens of Daldorf; Anabas testudineus of Cuvier. Its length is six or eight inches.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE COWTHORPE OAK.

THERE are few natural objects in this beautiful country of which an Englishman is more proud than its majestic oaks. Among the most celebrated of these trees are the Sidney Forest Oak, once used as a cattle-shed; the Chapel Oak, of Allonville; Damery's Oak, once used as a tavern; Holt Forest Oak; the Prison Oak, of Kidlinton; the Worksop Spread Oak; the Greendale Oak; and the Tockwith Oak, which stands within a mile of the Cowthorpe Oak, and is supposed to be "a chip of the old block"; but none of these can compare in dimensions with the Cowthorpe Oak, "the glory of England and the pride of Yorkshire":—

> In aged majesty a mighty oak
> Towers o'er the subject forest, itself a grove.—OVID.

Loudon's Gardener's Magazine states the Cowthorpe oak (Quercus pedunculata) to be undoubtedly the largest tree at present known in the kingdom. It stands near the market-town of Wetherby, in the West Riding of Yorkshire

Dr. Hunter, in Evelyn's "Sylva," in speaking of the great oak in Holt forest, which at five feet from the ground measures thirty-four feet, says, "However, neither this, nor any of the oaks mentioned by Mr. Evelyn, bear any proportion to one growing at Cowthorpe, near Wetherby."

This giant of the forest, at the venerable age of 1600 years, is fast falling to decay. The south-west side, which is shown in the accompanying Sketch (for which we are indebted to Mr. R. O. Hodgson), betrays marks of excessive violence—the trunk being torn and lacerated by the fall of the mighty arms, the junction of which may yet be clearly traced, and which renders this noble and imposing ruin highly picturesque.

In Hunter's "Evelyn's Sylva," in 1770, the girth of the trunk close to the ground is stated to be seventy-eight feet; but this measurement probably includes several buttress-like projections that rise from the roots against the trunk. The present girth at the ground is fifty feet, and at a yard high the girth is forty-five feet.

The south-west branch, which extended ninety feet from the trunk, fell in 1718; and another massive limb on the west side, which reached eighty feet from the trunk, the girth of which is supposed to have been twelve feet, fell in 1772. The greatest living branch (which is propped up) extends fifty feet in a north-easterly direction, and its girth near the trunk is about ten feet. Any of these branches, if planted upright, would have seemed formidable trees.

The oak has been hollow for generations. A few years since sixty men stood upright inside it, and on another occasion thirty-six sheep were penned within it.

Professor Burnett remarks:—"The history of the oak, whether natural or traditional, is one replete with interest. The reverence in which the tree was held, the oracles sought from it of old, the Druidic priesthood, the superstitions connected with it in other ages, all combine to render the annals of the oak, the chronicles of this forest king, a great part a history of the human race." The same ingenious writer remarks:—"Few persons, save those to whom habit has rendered it familiar, form anything like just estimates of the actual size of trees. The situations in which they commonly are seen, harmonising with the illimitable expanse of heaven, and the wide extent of forest scenery or of mountain heights, lessen ideally their upraised bulk; nor is it till singled from the surrounding landscape, nor even then, until the theodolite and rule proclaim their sums, that we become persuaded of their vast extent. Nay, figures themselves, to the generality of the world, convey but very imperfect conceptions of length, breadth, height, and girth. Some more familiar representations are wanted to prove that a majestic tree, which is only in moderate proportion as an ornament to nature in the country, is really an enormous mass, and would be esteemed a large and glorious structure among the dwellings and public walks of men in town. It is by comparing these forest kings with more homely objects that we alone become acquainted with their correct capacity. When seeing an oak seven feet in diameter, to the arrests not our attention; we even pass with little thought such as hold ten or twelve feet across, or more, although the smallest of these has a width as great as the carriage-way of Fetter-lane, near Templebar, or of Bedford-street, in the Strand."

Oak is often mistaken for chestnut. At a meeting of the Horticultural Society in 1854, for the purpose of comparison, specimens of the timber of our two English kinds of oak (Quercus pedunculata and Q. sessiliflora) and of Spanish chestnut were furnished by the Vice-Secretary, in order to exhibit the difference that exists between the woods of the pedunculate and sessile-flowered kinds, and chestnut, for which the timber of the last-named oak, when found in old buildings, has generally been mistaken. It was, however, proved by bits of wood from Westminster Hall that the timber in the roof of that building is not chestnut, as is still by many believed, but sessile-flowered oak, which, although softer, more pliable, and, easily worked, was stated to be in all respects superior to the now more common pedunculate kind. If we remember rightly, this matter was decided many years since by Mr. Loudon in his valuable "Arboretum Britannicum."

Two other celebrated Oaks have been engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS: the Avington Gospel Oak, in No. 404; and the Greendale Oak, in Welbeck Park, in No. 337.

THE LONDON ARMOURY COMPANY (Limited), Wholesale Manufacturers of Fire-arms to the Trade and her Majesty's War Department, sole manufacturers of Adams' Patent Revolvers, Bermondsey. Adams' Patent Revolver Pistol, by recent improvements now combines the following advantages:—

1st. It will be half-cocked at every loading, and full-cocked as it takes a deliberate aim.

2nd. The barrels, numbered to fit each cylinder, will in rapid succession without cocking, by merely pulling the trigger, which has been found essential in close quarters.

3rd. The new safety bolt fixes the cylinder so as to render an accidental explosion impossible, even when fully capped and charged.

4th. The new conical rivet gives great facilities in loading, and prevents the possibility of the charge carrying from lodging in fulminate or otherwise.

These improvements have rendered the weapon so perfect that it is now exclusively adopted by her Majesty's War Department.

To be obtained through any respectable Gunmaker in London, and in the principal towns in the United Kingdom. Price-lists for every description of fire-arms will be forwarded on application to ROBERT ADAMS, Manager.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1857.

THE capture of Bushire and Karak by the British forces, on the 10th ultimo, has, it appears, inclined the Shah to listen to reason, if not to make an absolute submission to the British Government. The measures of our Commanders in the East were well taken; for, while the Shah found his coasts at the mercy of our naval expedition under Admiral Lake, he found his capital itself menaced by the rapid march of Brigadier Chamberlayne through Cabul. Although the announcement of his submission, and his consequent relinquishment of Herat, is asserted by many to be premature, yet there are few who doubt the ultimate verification of the report. "Short, sharp, and decisive," is, as it should be, the maxim of British statesmen and commanders in all that relates to the policy and wars of the East; and, if the submission of the Shah be confirmed, as we believe it will, the Government may well take credit for the boldness of the attack and the success which has rewarded it. Under these circumstances the mission of Feroük Khan, the Persian Ambassador Extraordinary to the Court of the Tuileries, which has excited so much sensation in Paris, loses its interest. If the Shah have any objects to serve in connection with France, he is, of course, as free to pursue them as any other Sovereign, European or Asiatic; and the people of England will not object to any alliance that may result between the two, provided it be not formed with any hostile designs against this country. But if the Shah, whether at the instigation of Russia or from any other cause, has indulged the hope of procuring the mediation of France, or any other European Power, in the differences that have arisen between him and the British Government, and sent Feroük Khan to Europe for that purpose, he must learn that such interference is not in accordance with British notions. The British people respect the French, know to the full the blessings and advantages of the alliance, and, for sake of its stability and perpetuity, endure with equanimity many little rubs to their national vanity which might otherwise gall them; but they will not submit to the advice, much less to the interference, of the French Government in any matters relating to India, to the safety of our Indian frontier, or to the wars—great or little—in which we may become involved with our treacherous, restive, and unstable neighbours. If we may judge from the speech of Feroük Khan to the Emperor of the French, and from the general tone of the Emperor's reply, there was a likelihood, if the war had continued, that mediation would have been solicited on the part of Persia, and offered on the part of France. It would then have become the unpleasant, but the imperative, duty of the British Government respectfully, but firmly, to have declined it, and removed the question once for all out of the field of European politics. Feroük Khan will doubtless soon return to his own country, and may carry back with him much valuable information—which he can gain either in Paris or in London—as to the strength, the wealth, and the spirit of Great Britain. Let him impress on the mind of his Royal master that the English are determined to hold their own in India, and that their power is equal to their will; that they need no alliances in Europe to strengthen their hands in that quarter; and he may prepare the way for a better understanding between Great Britain and Persia than has lately been apparent. His mission will not have been fruitless if such should be its result; and, if his Excellency will favour London with a visit as well as Paris, he will receive a cordial reception, and learn perhaps some other facts that will serve to his still further enlightenment and that of his Sovereign.

At the meeting of "Ticket-of-leave men," summoned on Tuesday evening in the Farringdon Hall, under the immediate auspices of Mr. Henry Mayhew, though under the nominal presidency of the Earl of Carnarvon, some interesting statements were made, which may help to guide our legislators in reconsidering the difficult question of secondary punishments. Two or three facts deserve especial notice. The first is that even ticket-of-leave men may be maligned; and that, as a body, they indignantly disclaim any participation in the cowardly and abominable practice of garotting, at the alleged prevalence of which the public has latterly been so much alarmed. The second is that, although it is extremely difficult, it is not impossible for men who have been convicted of crime to obtain honest employment. Several cases were cited by men who had successfully struggled out of the paths of crime into those of industrious and honourable life, and who were maintaining wives and families on the humble wages of labour, or the scanty profits of the costermonger's cart. In all cases except those of the costermongers the possession of a ticket of leave was a serious, and often fatal, obstacle. The police were continually on the track of the unfortunate holder, betraying to his employer br to his fellow-workmen the unhappy secret of his former conviction and punishment, and causing him, as an almost inevitable consequence, to lose his situation. But with costermongers the case is different. Being their own masters, and trading as entirely on their own account as the merchant-princes of London, it is not in the power of thoughtless or malevolent police constables to do them an injury by the publication of their history to the chance customers who deal with them. Costermongering, having this advantage, and requiring but the modest capital sufficient to hire or buy a vehicle, and to purchase a day's merchandise, becomes the most available resource of ex-convicts, when liberated from prison. But in this crowded city even costermongering is as much overdone as any other calling and pursuit; and it is difficult for every ticket-of-leave man to betake himself to this branch of business and be successful in it. The man who has not a constitution sufficiently powerful to brave all weathers, and a stentorian voice in addition to his other gifts of body, is unable, however honestly disposed, to compete with the louder and more vigorous rivals who monopolize the patronage of the public. But the great and essential fact in connection with these men, which the legislators in both Houses of Parliament, for whose enlightenment Lord Carnarvon more especially summoned them together, should not overlook is, that the ticket of leave is of no use whatever. It is either inoperative, or it works to the injury of those who have the misfortune to have earned it. But if the ticket of leave entitled the holder to a free passage to any of our colonies its possession would be an advantage and a boon. The question being put to the meeting whether it would prefer a ticket of leave in England or a ticket of leave in the colonies, every hand in the room was held up in favour of the colonies—and not one in favour of England. This seems to point out a remedy for the evils which afflict these men, and which they in their turn inflict upon society. The law formerly transported them against their will to the colonies. Can society, after a period of probation such as they now endure before they are duly entitled to receive the useless ticket of leave, not transport or convey them to the colonies with their own consent—not as a punishment for crime, but as a reward for their good conduct while in prison? There is no terror in mere transportation, if dissociated from the idea of punishment, for every year upwards of 200,000, if not 300,000, of the inhabitants of the British Isles voluntarily transport themselves beyond the seas, to earn in our colonies the bread and the independence which are denied them at home. If the wishes and feelings of ticket-of-leave men and convicts, who are sincerely anxious to become honest and hardworking, are to guide us at all in the consideration of this question, it behoves philanthropists, lawgivers, and statesmen, to consider well whether this is not the best remedy yet suggested. Some of our colonies might object to receive men thus only half purified from the taint of crime; but others—such, for instance, as Western Australia—would only be too happy to receive them. In regions that require, in order to become rich, prosperous, and powerful, nothing but a few thousands of men and women with strong hands, they would obtain a fair field for the exercise of their industry; and as shepherds, farm labourers, handicraftsmen, and domestic servants would have the opportunity of becoming a credit to society instead of being, as at present, a misery to themselves, and the opprobrium of a civilisation that can neither kill them nor cure them, and that would rather not endure the burthen of feeding and taking care of them.

THE COURT.

The Queen continues to dispense a Royal hospitality at Windsor Castle. A succession of distinguished visitors have been received during the last week; and the ordinary attractions of the Court have derived additional interest from occasional dramatic performances

On Saturday her Majesty held an Investiture of the Order of the Bath. The Earl of St. Germans was created a civil, Knights Grand Cross; and a long list of naval and military officers and some diplomatists received distinctive grantions of the same honourable order. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and Viscount Palmerston were among the senior Knights present. Lord Panmure and Sir Charles Wood, as junior Knights, attended to assist in the Investiture. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and the Court of Chancery were likewise honoured the ceremony.

On Sunday the Court attended Divine service in the private chapel of the castle.

On Tuesday a large accession of visitors arrived at the Castle, among whom were the Russian Minister and Madame Castelcicala, the Spanish Ambassador, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl and Countess of Clarendon, the Earl and Countess Delawarr, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Lady Theresa Lewis. The Countess Cheapside with, who is a daughter of Count Nesselrode, had not previously been introduced to her Majesty.

On Wednesday morning the Prince Consort enjoyed the sport of shooting in the Royal preserves; the French Ambassador and the Russian Minister accompanying his Royal Highness. In the evening a dramatic performance took place in St. George's Hall. The pieces selected were Mr. Planché's drama of "Secret Service," and Mr. Charles Dance's burletta, entitled "Irish Money." Mr. F. Robson, Mr. F. Matthews, Mrs. A. Wigan, and Miss Talbot represented the principal characters

On Thursday the Queen and the Prince took an early walk in the Castle grounds.

Lord Dufferin and the Hon. Mortimer Sackville West have succeeded Lord Waterpark and Colonel the Hon. N. Hood as the Lord and the Groom in Waiting on her Majesty.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALFRED.—The Queen and the Prince continue to receive the best accounts of the health of his Royal Highness Prince Alfred from Geneva, where he has been residing for some weeks

Her Serene Highness the Princess Hohenlohe-Langenburg has arrived in England on a visit to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent.

The Countess Granville has issued cards for an assembly on Monday next, the 2nd proximo.

The Earl of Lucan arrived in town on Saturday from Paris.

THE PRINCESS DE LIEVEN.

THIS lady, so well known in diplomatic world, whose death has just occurred, was a member of the German family of Benkendorff. Her father was a favourite of Alexander I., Emperor of Russia, and her brother became that monarch's Aide-de-Camp and Minister of Police. The husband of Madame de Lieven was seat as Ambassador from Russia to the Court of Berlin in 1803, and there remained accredited from 1808 to 1812. Somewhere towards the close of 1812 Monsieur de Lieven came to London to represent the Court of the Czar. Madame de Lieven soon made herself agreeable in London society by her talents and accomplishments, and not a little aided her husband as well as Pozzo di Borgo and Gentz, who came on a special service from Austria between 1812 and 1814. The lady had so far ingratiated herself with the aristocracy of rank and fashion in London that she was esteemed a general favourite and a great acquisition to the corps diplomatique. In 1834 M. de Lieven was recalled to St. Petersburg, and was appointed governor and tutor of the Czarewitch (the present Emperor), and with that Imperial Prince made the tour of a great part of Southern Europe. At Rome M. de Lieven was seized with a sudden illness and died on the 10th of January, 1839. After the decease of her husband Madame de Lieven fixed her residence in Paris in 1839 and 1840, in a large house in some mansion, and congregated about her the chief political and literary celebrities of France. In her boudoirs the principal business of the Russian embassy was said to be done. Madame de Lieven, in fact, enjoyed much of the confidence of the Emperor Nicholas, who had married her husband's family to princely rank. For a short period during the embassy of M. Guizot the Princess de Lieven returned to her country. After 1848 she removed to Brussels. Apart from her politics, Madame de Lieven was a lady of accomplishments and esprit, a good linguist, an excellent musician, a good historian, and possessed many other varied talents and attainments.

LADY CARHAMPTON.

MARIA, COUNTESS OF CARHAMPTON, died at her residence at Brighton, on the 18th inst., in her eighty-first year. Her ladyship was the eldest daughter of John Morgan, Esq., of the Inner Temple, and Recorder of Maidstone, and was the widow of John Luttrell, third and last Earl of Carhampton, to whom she was married in 1788, being his second wife, and had an only daughter, the Lady Maria Anne, who was married, in 1811, to Colonel Hardress Roberts Saunderson, of the county of Cavan. The Earl Carhampton died on the 17th March, 1829, without male issue; when the Earldom of Carhampton and the other honours of the ancient and distinguished family of Luttrell became extinct.

MR. BARON ALDERSON.

THE HON. SIR EDWARD HALL ALDERSON, First Puisne Baron of the Court of Exchequer, who was the eldest son of Robert Alderson, Esq., barrister-at-law, and for many years Recorder of Norwich, was born at Great Yarmouth, in 1787, and went, when very young, to Caius College, Cambridge, where he attained the highest honours both in classics and mathematics, having been the senior Wrangler, Smith's prizeman, and Senior Chancellor's medallist, in 1809. He also became a Fellow of Caius College, and took the degree of M.A. there in 1812. He was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of the Inner Temple in 1811, having previously practised for a very short time as a special pleader; he went the Northern Circuit, and, after some years of unproductive but earnest expectation and exertion, he contrived, by dint of sheer learning and ability, to obtain considerable practice and high legal standing. What particularly tended to bring him into notice was his editing, from 1818 to 1822, in conjunction with the late Richard Vaughan Barnewall, Esq., the first series of those famous reports of cases decided in the Court of Queen's Bench which, as Barnewall and Alderson's, Barnewall and Cresswell's, and Barnewall and Adolphus's Reports, are familiar as household words to the ears of the profession and the public. Mr. Alderson had, before 1830, attained, both on his circuit and in Westminster Hall, the character of a sound and scientific lawyer. His practice had largely increased, especially in Liverpool, where most of the important mercantile cases were intrusted to his management. He had reached this prosperous position, when, in the beginning of 1830, he was elevated to the judicial bench as a Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, which office he exchanged in 1834 for that of a Baron of the Exchequer. He was knighted in 1835. As a Judge, Sir Edward Alderson was even more distinguished than as a counsel. On the Bench his legal and general knowledge was most conspicuous; his decisions have been invariably sound and acute; and to him we owe some of the best judgments that have of late proceeded from the Court of Exchequer, and have added to the fame of the learned Baron. Of outstanding a master of Equity, Devon, a scion of the ancient family of the Drewes of the Grange. This lady's elder sisters were Marianne, the wife of Algernon, the third son of Robert Eden, Esq., and Harriet Maria, the wife of Robert Lord Gifford, Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. Mr. Baron Alderson died, after a short but severe illness, on the 27th inst., at his residence, 9, Park-crescent, Portland-place. He leaves a large family. Some of his sons are at the Bar. One of them recently succeeded the late Mr. Carkson as Recorder of Faversham.

We are happy to announce the recovery of D. Jones, Esq., of Pantglas, member for Carnarvon, from a very severe ophthalmic affection.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

READERS at a distance from Great Britain, and readers confined to their rooms by ill health—and there are, alas, too many in this state—will learn with regret that Mr. Thackeray has postponed for another year the publication of a new novel. His lectures on the Four Georges continue so deservedly popular that he has no time for the labours of a new serial. All who have the good fortune to hear Mr. Thackeray can wait more patiently than those who have no opportunity of attending even one of his lectures; but readers in distant colonies will miss a favourite author, whose place in literature is not to be supplied.

Lord Campbell announces a new book, another octavo volume, containing the lives of three of his predecessors on the Bench—Lord Chief Justice Kenyon, Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough, and Lord Chief Justice Tenterden. He is treading on the ashes of the dead, and will tread tenderly. The real excellence of Lord Campbell's biographies consists in what he tells from personal knowledge: what he derives from books is about as poor as poor can be.

We hope that there is no truth in a rumour now current that part of the first two thousand pounds voted by the House for Lord Stanhope's Portrait Gallery of British Worthies will be spent in paying for copies of pictures of which the originals are not to be had for love or money. Let the first two thousand pounds be spent in obtaining the best original portraits that can be obtained, and gifts of moment will immediately follow. The trustees, it is said, are already named: Lord Stanhope is, of course, one; and a house for the reception and exhibition of purchases and gifts has been all but finally chosen by Sir Benjamin Hall.

The Guildhall monument (by Bell) to the Duke of Wellington is all but erected. The Duke is up—and up a little too high, it is said; for the fine bust of the great soldier (carved, we are told, in Mr. Bell's very best manner) is seen but very indifferently by spectators in the Hall. Beckford's monument, in its new position, looks as formerly—poor as a work of art, but very interesting from the historical importance of the never-delivered speech which it carries as an inscription.

The new, the almost as yet unpublished, number of the Quarterly contains a capital anecdote of Lord Raglan when wounded at Waterloo. The authority is the Prince of Orange. The Prince, we are told, used to recount that not a word announced the entry of a new patient, nor was he conscious of the presence of Lord Raglan (then Lord Fitzroy Somerset) till he heard him call out in the usual way—"Hallo! don't carry away that arm till I have taken off my ring." Neither the wound nor the operation had extorted a groan from the wounded soldier.

Our readers will be happy to learn that Mr. Roberts has carefully retouched and finished up for the Manchester Exhibition his large and beautiful sunset view of Rome, exhibited two years ago.

Mr. Ruskin has sounded (so his admirers admit) the first loud note of his recantation. He is no longer Turner-mad (read his new pamphlet); he is hardly Turner-bitten. Like a Bedlamite recovered, the foam of his dogmatism has subsided into a more sober admiration. As the film passes from his eyes, he begins to see an absence of nature in many of Turner's productions, and a little infinitesimal kind of merit in the "light Lorraine" and the "learned Poussin." We utter not our own words; such is the talk, and in good circles. Those who have pooh-poohed him from the first foretell a louder recantation, and boldly bet, in the true style of Tattersall's or White's, that before another season is over he will have become so tired of his Turner triumphs that he will take (not for money) advantage of the market, and turn his collection into Christie and Manson's, or Sotheby and Wilkinson's. The jeerers laugh loudly at a passage in his newly-published "Notes on the Turner Acquisition to the National Gallery," where he detects, or imagines he detects (not unlikely), that a certain "dark bottle" which a fisherman shakes, it is said, at his wife contains a cribbed quantity of cognac—thus explaining (what will not an artistic eye discover?) that this otherwise unreasonably-excited fisherman has excellent reason for the supposed angry manner of his supposed farewell to his supposed wife. The force of folly can no further go. Will, it is said, the next of Turner's kin kindly ask Mr. Ruskin to drop Turner from this day forth? "Your 'caveat' was successful, Mr. Next-of-Kin—but you have still your 'stock'—and a writer of excellent English, at Denmark-hill, is unintentionally damaging your property. Men at Manchester and Liverpool will cry off. Take care, Messrs. Garabart, Grundy, and Graves; you may have too much of a good thing; collectors are led, not driven. And this melancholy Turner tomfoolery (as a very unbedlamite painter called it) is now at turning-point.

Who has not heard of the tons of books of every kind sent to our noble, suffering soldiers in the Crimea? Many a London swell stripped his once well-filled father's shelves—part of a fine inheritance—of its replenished contents of recently-published books—mixed and curious—to send to the Crimea. Everybody in (what now appears) a wild fit of philanthropy sent crates of every size and character to friendly receivers in London and the many outports of England. These crates, of reached, strange to say, their Balaclava landing. What was their fate? The noble soldiers smelt the contents afar off, and within the last few months these self-same crates of this benevolent trash in literature was returned to London unopened. The contents of these many crates have since been sold for waste paper; for, after vain endeavours to pass them—even on common booksellers and back auctioneers—this literature for the suffering has gone to the mill and the butter-merchant, and the money obtained will not pay the cost of its freightage home. How that true son of Adam Smith, Mr M'Culloch, must have laughed at the trash which, as Comptroller of the Stationery-office, he was obliged to condemn as unworthy of the donors, and, worse still, unworthy of the literature which he has done so much to illustrate and adorn!

All such reading as was never read,

A word about the present Lord Lyttelton. "Free as young Lyttelton" is part of a fine passage in one of Pope's finest works. The compliment was well deserved—the Lyttelton of Pope was the sustaining friend of the two best writers of his age who stood in need of support—the author of "The Seasons" and the author of "Tom Jones." The Lord Lyttelton of our day follows not with slavish folly the free and manly footsteps of the good Lord Lyttelton. Very thoughtful was his Lordship's recent lecture on Shakspeare at the Manchester Athenæum.

A bit of news connected with art reached us as we passed the Royal Academy. Young Lord Cowper has lent his fine Raphaels to the Manchester Exhibition. Such Raphaels! the Pansbanger Raphaels!

The funeral of the lamented artist Krüger took place last Sunday morning at Berlin. The carriages of their Majesties and of some of the Princes, the servants in State liveries, followed in the procession. All the most eminent patrons of the arts and artists were present.

MUSIC.

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY have made an important addition to their répertoire by the production of one of the greatest works of Mendelssohn, hitherto little known to the English public—the music to the lyrical parts of Racine's tragedy of "Athalie." It was performed at Exeter-hall on Friday, the 23rd inst., together with Rossini's "Stabat Mater," performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society for the first time. The announcement of these pieces, especially the first, excited great interest, and the hall was filled by an immense assemblage.

Mendelssohn's "Athalie" belongs to an ancient form of music which is now [illegible] revived. It belonged to a series of works which occupied him during the latter period of his life, and has been preceded by his music to the choral [illegible] of the Antigone and the "Œdipus at Colonos." After [illegible] accordingly in the songs to Racine in music, the lyrical portions of the ancient Grecian dramatist, he was induced to make a similar [illegible] on a modern classical drama, "which" (says Schlegel), "of all the French tragedies, approaches the nearest to the grand style of the Greeks." It is said that he undertook this task at the instance of the King of Prussia, who desired to have a German version of Racine's play produced on the Berlin stage, accompanied (as that had been of Œdipus and Sophocles had previously been) with the music of Mendelssohn. He wrote the music accordingly, with the view of its being introduced into a complete representation of the tragedy. But the music became afterwards to be performed in the concert-room, without theatrical action; the lyrical portions of the tragedy being connected by the recitation of a narrative poem, which served to explain the subject and incidents of the piece. Soon after this work had appeared in Germany it was introduced to this country. The poem recited along with the performance of the choral lyrics, was written by Mr. Bartholomew, whose name is so closely associated with that of Mendelssohn as his friend and literary coadjutor. It is original and independent of the German poem, and does honour to Mr. Bartholomew's judgment and taste. In this manner the music was first performed in 1840 before the Queen at Windsor, and afterwards at two concerts of the Philharmonic Society. On those occasions it was heard by very limited audiences; and it may be said that it has only now been brought, by the grand performance of the Sacred Harmonic Society, before the British public. In its present manner of performance, though it was not contemplated by Mendelssohn, "Athalie has been changed from a tragedy to an oratorio. Handel's oratorio of "Athaliah" was also founded on Racine's play, but the form of the two works is entirely different. In the tragedy the choral lyrics constitute the conclusion or finale of each act; and in Mendelssohn's music the whole of Racine's noble poetry is preserved, the intermediate links being supplied by the recitation. The poem of Handel's oratorio is feeble and flat. The English writer borrowed the subject and incidents from Racine, but none of his inspiration: nor has Handel been happy in his music, which has fallen into oblivion.

The performance of what we may call Mendelssohn's Oratorio at Exeter-hall was of the most magnificent description. The poem was recited by Mr. Phelps, with the impressive dignity to be expected from that eminent tragedian. The solo parts (all for female voices) were sung by Mdme. Clara Novello, Miss Sherrington (now Mdme. Lemmans), and Miss Dolby. Mr. Costa had evidently bestowed the utmost care upon the rehearsals; and, though it was a first performance, the grand choral music was sung with a degree of precision, delicacy, and power which the Exeter-hall choristers have seldom equalled, even in the oratorios most familiar to them. The effect of the whole was prodigious, and the general feeling was enthusiastic admiration of all concerned. Mr. Costa [illegible] ultimate success. It is the consummation of musical [illegible] by the purple [illegible] and [illegible] which appeals, not merely to the judgment of connoisseurs and critics, but to the ear and the heart of every one who "hath music in his soul." Hence, we doubt not, "Athalie" (we wish it had been called "Athaliah") will reach a degree of popularity in England not exceeded even by that of "Elijah."

Rossini's "Stabat Mater," though never before performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society, is well known to the musical public, and calls for little remark. Though it and "Athalie" are as "far as the poles asunder," yet the one was a very agreeable sequel to the other—agreeable from their very dissimilarity. Rossini's music, though void of the severe grandeur of the ecclesiastical style, and redolent of the opera-house rather than of the church, is exceedingly beautiful; and its sweet, flowing, graceful airs, and pure, simple, resonant harmonies, cannot be listened to, when well performed, without exquisite pleasure. The solo parts were sung by Madame Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti;—a better choice could not be made; and the choral pieces were carefully and smoothly executed. The audience were delighted, and showed their pleasure by the unrestrained warmth of their applause.

MR. GEORGE FORBES'S Second Subscription Concert at St John's-wood took place on Tuesday evening last. The principal performer was Miss Louisa Vinning, who sang the cavatina, "Tacea la Notte," from the "Trovatore," Donizetti's romance, "Come è bello," Frank Mori's pretty ballad, "The Fairy Gate," and (with Mr. Lennant) the duet, "Parigi o cara." She sang admirably and was greatly applauded. Mr. Lester, a young singer, made his first public appearance with great success. His voice is of a class very rarely met with—a pure counter-tenor of extraordinary compass, extending to B natural (the fourth space in the treble clef), and possessed of singular volume and sweetness. He sang Macfarren's song, "The Ring," and Holmes's "Good night, beloved;" and, in both, the audience appeared to be surprised as well as delighted with his vocal power, and his taste and feeling. Mr. Lester is a performer much wanted at the present time, and cannot fail of success. Mr. Forbes performed a new fantasia composed by himself, on subjects from the "Traviata," and (with Pratt) Beethoven's Sonata in A for the piano and violoncello. He is one of our most accomplished pianists, both in respect to execution and style; and his chamber-concerts are always among the most elegant entertainments of the season.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES AT BELFAST.—Miss Catharine Hayes is on a tour in Ireland, accompanied by Mdlle. Corelli (contralto), Signor F. Lablache (barytone), and Signor Millardi (tenor); and by Mr. G. A. Osborne, composer and pianist, as conductor. The Belfast papers state that Miss Hayes was enthusiastically received in that town. The grand scena and aria, "Softly sighs the voice of evening," was given delightfully, evincing by every note she sang the beauty, richness, and power of her voice in all its ranges. Signor Millardi then followed, in aria, "Bel adorata." Applause, hearty and sustained, rewarded this gentleman in his performances during the evening. After this solo Miss Hayes again appeared, and in her charming style sang "The Last Rose of Summer," which was encored. She reappeared, and delighted her admirers with "The harp that once through Tara's halls." Mdlle. Corelli next sang the cavatina, "In questo semplice," by Donizetti, and was warmly applauded for the sweet and agreeable style in which she rendered it. The first part of the programme was concluded with a duo by Miss Hayes and Signor Lablache, "Signorina in tanta fretta," from "Don Pasquale." After an interval of some ten minutes the second part of the performance commenced with a duo, "Versiamo del vino," by Mdlle. Corelli and Millardi. Miss Hayes then sang "Home, sweet home," and, in compliance with an enthusiastic encore, she gave "Coming through the rye." This appeared to be the gem of the evening, if we are to judge by the outbursts of delighted and gratified feeling it elicited.

THE MUSICAL UNION, under the direction of Mr. ELLA, is about to give three soirées before Easter, at Willis's Rooms. In addition to the usual selections of classical instrumental music, these performances will be varied by the introduction of sacred and secular compositions sung by a chamber choir, under the direction of Mr. Land. The Matinées, as usual, will commence after Easter, for which, we are informed, the subscription is already very large.

MDME. GRISI has just returned to London from Paris to fulfil an engagement with Mr. Beale in the provinces. The success which has attended her performances in the "Trovatore" at the Italian Opera-house in Paris is the greatest event of the musical season, larger audiences having been assembled to witness the opera than have been seen in the Salle Ventadour since the memorable year 1847.

THE EAST INDIA COMPANY.—Another instance of the liberality of the Court of Directors has been shown by the grant of £100 per annum to Mrs. Thompson, the mother of the late Lieutenant H. L. Thompson, who, it is well known, so gallantly contributed to the defence of Kars.

The range of temperature during the week was 20·4 deg.

Snow fell on the evening of the 24th and morning of the 25th, and remained on the ground during the 25th and 26th. On the afternoon of the latter day snow again fell but ceased at 6 p.m., when the sky became brilliantly clear. Hoar frost covered the ground on the mornings of the 22nd, 27th, and 28th.

Heavy rain fell during the day and evening of the 24th, and also on the night of the 22nd and morning of the 23rd.

The sky has been much overcast, but was very clear on the nights of the 27th and 28th and at midnight of the 25th, and was partially clear on the days of the 22nd, 23rd, 27th, and 28th.

REPRESENTATION OF SALFORD.—MR E. R. Langworthy, the candidate for the representation of Salford, in place of the late Mr. Wortington, addressed the electors on Tuesday evening, and met with a very enthusiastic reception. After answering some questions in the course of which he said he thought that the franchise should be coextensive with intelligence and education, that he considered church-rates unjust and unfair, that he was opposed to the principle of Sturges-Bourne's Act, that he should support the Factory Act, that he was disposed to support the Maynooth grant, that he did not think Sunday trade so great a desecration of the Sabbath as some of his friends did, but that he should hesitate to support the legislation of them if he felt that a large number of his fellow-citizens entertained it a point of conscience to oppose them, and that he was for the abolition of the ecclesiastical courts—a resolution that he was eminently qualified to represent the borough of Salford in Parliament was carried with only one dissentient voice. It was expected that the nomination would be fixed for Monday next.

EARTHQUAKE.—(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)—A slight shock of earthquake was felt here at twenty minutes past three p.m. yesterday. There was a heavy rumbling noise, like that of a luggage-train at the distance of half-a-mile, and at the same time a tremulous motion was felt on the soles of the feet. The earthquake pendulum (which is thirty-three feet in length) moved from west to east, and the extent of the movement was less than the eighth of an inch. The noise and motion lasted above a minute. It was also heard at the Highfield House Observatory.—I am, &c., E. J. LOWE, Observatory, Beeston, near Nottingham, Jan. 26, 18

FALL OF A RAILWAY BRIDGE.—Last Monday the traffic of the line of railway between Coventry and Nuneaton, a branch of the London and North-Western was for a time completely stopped by the falling in of a viaduct at Cowden, a short distance from Coventry. The bridge, which is of several arches, is of stone, and carries over the rails a very important old turnpike road of the district; but, fortunately, at the time the accident occurred, not the slightest injury befell either the road or railway travellers. A train had passed under the bridge only a short time before, but, besides the damage sustained by the railway company and the detention of trains, no injury was sustained by any individual.

A BOY CAPTAIN.—The brig James, of Leith, which arrived at this port on the 22nd inst., with a cargo of timber, was navigated across the Atlantic by a boy of fifteen, assisted only by coloured seamen, her captain and crew having all died of yellow fever at Demerara, with the exception of the boy, cook, and mate; and the latter fell from the yard on the 1st instant, and was killed.—Belfast News Letter

TICKET-OF-LEAVE MEN.—The following humane advertisement appears in the Manchester newspapers:—"Ticket-of-leave men in Manchester.—Should there be any ticket-of-leave men in Manchester out of employment, who are desirous of obtaining an honest livelihood, they may with confidence give their names, and where they may be communicated with, and there will be an endeavour to obtain employment for them.—Address K 29, at the printer's."

THE BANK CHARTER ACT.—The following reply has been returned to the memorial recently forwarded to the Treasury by the Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce on the subject of the Bank Charter Act. Treasury Chamber, January 23, 1857 Sir,—The Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury having had before them the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures in Edinburgh, dated the 18th inst., recommending the introduction of a bill into Parliament authorising the transfer to the Issue Department of the Bank of England of additional securities to the value of £a,800,000, and the creation of notes to that amount, have commanded me to acquaint you in reply, that it is apprehended that the question of Parliament may be called to the law as it relates to the privileges of the Bank of England, and the Act of 1844, my Lords feel that they will best consult the public convenience and interests by postponing any expression of opinion upon this subject. I am to add, however, that the views expressed in the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce shall receive due consideration.—I am, Sir, your obedient Servant, J. LAMBTON.

NORFOLK ISLAND.—The Government having decided on the erection of a large prison at Norfolk Island for the reception of convicts under sentence of transportation, an order has been forwarded from the War Office to Colonel H. Sandham, director of the Royal Engineers' establishment at Brompton-barracks, Chatham, directing him to hold in readiness one company of that corps, with a proportion of officers and non-commissioned officers, to embark forthwith for Norfolk Island, for the purpose of assisting in the erection of the convict establishment at that station.

THE RUSSIAN DEFEATS.—Letters from Circassia in the Journal de Constantinople, in confirming the defeat of the Russians near Tabachmaz, announce that the Circassian chief Ibrahim Bey, son of Sefer Pacha, has had two successive encounters with the Russians on the two rivers which traverse the road from Stavropol to Anapa. The mountaineers are reported to have inflicted a severe loss on the Russians, and to have massacred all the prisoners who fell into their hands. It was said that a Russian General was amongst the fallen at Giumka.

AN AMERICAN WELCOME FOR BRITISH SAILORS.—The New York Board of Counsellors have resolved to give an official welcome to the officers of her Majesty's ship Retribution, in the event of their arrival, there. One red-hot Republican councillor opposed the motion on the ground that he did not like the idea of paying honour to Queen Victoria in the officers of the Brooklyn navy-yard are preparing to give the British a warm reception. The press, too, is unanimous in expressing friendly sentiments towards this country for its reception of Captain Hartstein.

WONDERFUL, IF TRUE.—A small Paris journal, called Les Contemporains, has just published a most startling account, signed "Henri Page," of an aerostatic excursion which the article declares has solved the long-canvassed problem of directing balloons. The persons who are stated to have made the excursion are the Count de Flesselles, M. Gavarni, M. Migeon, Mr. Falconer, an English aeronaut, and M. Henri Page, the writer. The apparatus used is stated to have cost not less than 300,000f., the greater portion of which was furnished by Count de Flesselles. The machine is represented as consisting of two balloons united together, of a spherical form, able to contain each 103 cubes of pure hydrogen gas. The directing power is a modified screw communicating with the car, and a rudder, made principally of whalebone, to change the direction when required. M. Gavarni, the inventor, it is declared, can obtain the upward movement of the balloon without throwing out ballast, which system soon exhausts the resources of the very best-constructed balloon, and becomes an invincible obstacle to long excursions in the air. The loss of hydrogen is instantaneously repaired by a chemical proceeding of which M. Migeon is stated to possess the secret, and by a little apparatus of communication, invented by M. Gavarni. The descent is stated, as hitherto, by letting the gas escape. The excursion of the aeronauts on the occasion referred to took place on the 16th of January, at ten in the morning, from the park of Perrières, in the Sologne; and the next morning, at five, the aerial travellers effected a safe descent within half a mile of Algiers. "We received," says the account, "the most touching hospitality. The inhabitants wanted to carry us in triumph. We declined the honour; and, as soon as we could, went to take some repose, leaving our aerostatic apparatus under the guardianship of a file of Zouaves. Marshal Randon deigned to congratulate us, and pressed the hand of M. Gavarni with the utmost warmth. We remained on the African soil only thirty hours, and left at noon the day after our arrival, in sight of an immense multitude who had assembled to see us ascend from the Mole. Our return was effected without the slightest accident, but with much greater rapidity. At half-past four the next morning we alighted at the spot from which we started, in the park of Count de Flesselles."

THE WAR WITH CHINA.

THE BRITISH FACTORIES AT CANTON.—(SEE PAGE 80.)

H.M.S. Encounter, off Canton, Nov. 10.

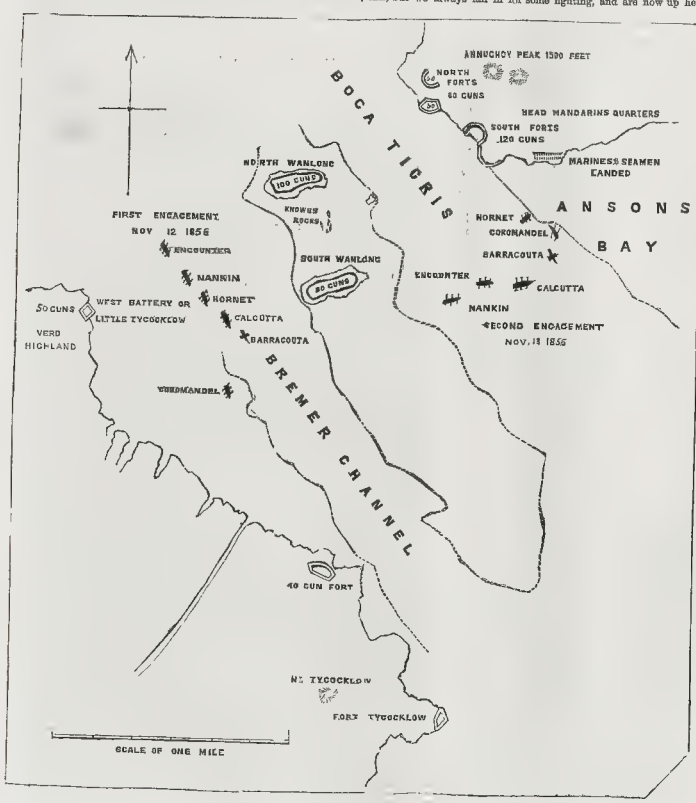
No doubt you expected we should have been on our way home by this, but we always fall in for some fighting, and are now up here bombarding Canton. We have had some sharp work, and have taken the principal part of their forts; one with eighty-six guns, larger than any used in Europe, a brass one weighing nearly twelve tons. A few days since we took twenty-two of their war-junks—some with twelve, and none with less than eight, guns, twenty-four and thirty-two pounders; these we burnt, and spiked their guns. But we have found spiking guns of little use here, for the Chinese are capital hands at reboring them; and, when they cannot manage that, they turn the gun over and bore a fresh vent on the opposite side. Yesterday we were busy making a chain of junks across the river, above and below the ships, for they tried to set fire to us three nights ago: they chain a number of their large junks together filled with combustibles, and large pieces of timber hollowed out and filled with powder, the explosion of which is very pretty at night; but, thank Heaven, they have not done us any harm. The large ships cannot get up here, but are anchored about fifteen miles down the river. All the marines and small-arms men are ashore, to protect the English settlement. The flag is in this ship, and the Admiral is living on shore; he is a fine fellow, and lots of fight in him. The Chinese soldiers we are now keeping at bay are about 30,000. The city contains 3,000,000 inhabitants, and is very wealthy. We have burnt some of the suburbs, but the Admiral is sparing the city. Day and night they keep us on the alert with the fire-rafts they drop down with the ebb tide; and the only way to avoid them is to slip and steam up above them. As this is a useful ship, drawing only fifteen feet water, with 68 and 84 pounders, the Admiral will not be able to spare us till some satisfactory conclusion is come to.

Nov. 14.

Since writing this letter we have had a job to take some forts called the Bocca Tigris, containing 500 of the largest guns I ever saw—none less than ten inches bore, and some of the brass ones thirteen inches. We towed the Nankin into action, the Barracouta towed the Calcutta (the flag-ship). After two hours' firing we manned boats of squadron, and took the two large forts on Wanlong Island, containing 100 guns each. The moment the men got on shore the Chinese took to their boats, and those the boats would not hold took to the water. An immense number of them were drowned from its being spring tide; many were picked up in our boats and landed. We began the action on the 12th at seven a.m., and finished it yesterday by noon, with very little harm done to us or the ships.



PLAN OF THE ATTACK ON THE FORTS AND BATTERIES OF CANTON, NOV. 12 AND 18, 1856.

The Russians appear to be very much alarmed at our proceedings in China. A letter from St. Petersburg of the 8th, in the Journal des Débats, says:—

The news of the attack on Canton by the English fleet has produced a considerable sensation here. It appears certain that depôts of goods belonging to Russian merchants have been burnt, and that their loss of property has been considerable. This act, which is perfectly unjustifiable, and for which no serious motive can be assigned, is regarded here as the prelude to the conquest which the English propose to themselves to make of the Island of Chusan. The Russian Government is perfectly aware of the intentions of the English, and of all the plans which they meditate in China, and for which purpose they have been for some years past very quietly increasing the naval force on that station, until they have now a very formidable fleet there. All the intrigues carried on by English agents, with a view to ruin the important commercial relations which the Russian merchants carry on with China through the town of Kiachta, are well known at St. Petersburg. It does not unfrequently happen that large quantities of tea of the finest qualities thus imported by land into Russia are purchased by English houses, and sent to London. It is well known with what jealousy the English watch the progress of the Russian military and commercial establishments on the river Amur, where we already touch, by the south of Siberia, for a distance of more than 400 kilometres (250 miles), on the Chinese frontier. All the triangle between that part of Siberia and of the Amur, and of which Nicholaieff has been designed by the Emperor to be the new capital, may be now considered as definitively belonging to the Russian empire. The intelligent men who were sent some years ago into those distant countries have so well secured Russian domination there that all commercial affairs with the Chinese provinces may be said to be exclusively in the hands of Russian merchants. The anxiety of the English to dislodge the Russians from these countries may be thus readily conceived, but they will have the more difficulty in effecting their purpose that the different Russian military establishments along the Amur are becoming every day more and more formidable. It may be also remembered that the English made a fruitless attempt in 1855 to penetrate with their squadron into this river, the mouth of which has been since so well fortified that it would now cost immense efforts and sacrifices to force this new Cronstadt with vessels of war.

THE WAR WITH PERSIA.

PUNJAUB BATTERY PREPARING TO ENTER THE DURWANZAL PASS INTO THE KOORUM VALLEY.

WE have been favoured by an accredited Correspondent, of the Punjaub Artillery, with the two accompanying Sketches of the movement of troops towards the seat of the War with Persia:—

Camp Thull, Meranzaie Valley, Nov. 30, 1856.

I send you two Sketches, which represent the mode of transporting field Artillery over the mountain passes on the Punjaub frontier. The Views were taken during the late expedition into the Koorum Valley, commanded by Brigadier Chamberlain, and as the troops were about to enter the Durwaunah (door) Pass.

The gun—a 9-pounder, or 24-pounder howitzer—is carried on one elephant, the carriage on a second, and a third carries the ammunition. A gun can be dismounted and packed on an elephant in this manner in ten minutes; and can be unpacked and prepared for action in less than that time.

The second Sketch represents the Peshawur Madras Force on the line of march. A gun, or howitzer, and its carriage are carried on three mules, exclusive of the mules for ammunition. This battery for the march can be prepared for action in less than a minute, and can be again packed and got ready for the march in a much shorter time. This expedition has been so far useful, that nothing was before known of the country except from native information: now a most valuable survey has been made by Lieut. Garnett, of the Engineers, and Lieut. Lumsden of the Quartermaster-General's Dépôt; while the Koorum Valley may now be considered the high road between India and Cabul, being much more practicable in every point of view than through the Khybur Pass. Dost Mahomed is to be at Peshawur to meet Sir John Lawrence, on the 10th proximo.

THE PESHAWUR MOUNTAIN IN THE LINE OF MARCH.

THE COMING SESSION.

A RETROSPECT of the period which has elapsed since the prorogation of Parliament shows that six months cannot pass over the heads of any given body of men without producing many changes. Death and circumstances have caused several alterations in the personal constitution of both Houses of the Legislature during their annual recess.

As the new Palace of Westminster, notwithstanding its having been in course of construction for nearly a quarter of a century, is still an unfinished building,—that has also been subject, in a certain degree, to the process of mutation since it was last occupied for the business of the nation. As regards the external appearance of the structure there is little difference to observe. The Clock Tower, which has been a subject of some notoriety in the last two or three months, remains outwardly in an unfinished state; its summit is still encrusted with bird's nest scaffolding; the face of the clock is still covered with rough unsightly boarding; while "Big Ben," reposing at the base of the Tower, holds a continuous reception of visitors every day from nine till dusk.

The Victoria Tower has approached so far towards completion as to have had its last story crowned by the wooden outlines of the four turrets which are to adorn its angles. The turrets themselves are still, however, in "supposition," and workmen are busy in the interior of the tower, getting into shape the sixteen floors which it contains, each of which consists of four rooms. The frontage of the building, extending from the Victoria Tower to St. Stephen's Porch, which looks into Old Palace Yard, and which forms the façade of the House of Lords, is in a state of great forwardness, but is not so far completed as to allow of the removal of the hoarding which disfigures and partly conceals so important a portion of the structure. Altogether, the aspect of affairs on the out side of the Palace generally is unsatisfactory and unsightly, and no very perceptible improvement has been made in that respect during the recess.

On entering Westminster Hall it will be observed that the temporary candelabra, six in number, with which the hall has hitherto been lighted have been replaced by very handsome permanent ones, gorgeous with gilding and bronze. The design of the burners is the same as that of the large and elaborate lantern which illuminates the central hall. In St. Stephen's Hall statues of Charles Fox (by Baily) and of the Earl of Chatham (by Macdowall) have been placed on two of the hitherto vacant pedestals. Only three of those now remain unoccupied, and these it is understood will be filled by marble portraitures of William Pitt, Burke, and Grattan. A cast of the statue of the latter was for a time placed for trial on the pedestal appointed for it, and it is supposed that the statue itself will be erected ere long. In the corridor leading to the lobby of the House of Lords a single fresco has been painted by Cope, entitled "The Embarkation of a Puritan Family for America." It is executed with great care and finish, the grouping is good, and the subject generally treated in a suggestive manner; but it wants breadth; and somehow it gives one a notion of want of appropriateness to the corridor of the Lords. In the Prince's Chamber, which, as is well known, is the principal antechamber and writing-room to the House of Lords, Gibson's marble group of the Queen, attended by Justice and Mercy, has been placed in the recess which has been prepared for its reception. Whatever may be its merits as a work of art, the group as it is now located is singularly ineffective. It is stuck against the wall in such a position that it cannot be seen with any satisfaction unless the spectator goes a long way back into the Victoria Corridor, leading into the Prince's Chamber; while the principal figure is perched on the highest possible pedestal, and the top of the chair in which it is seated are very nearly touching the ceiling. It is, in fact, a piece of sculpture better suited for the centre of the quadrangle of a palace than for a recess in a room which is only about the size of a well-proportioned library. Proceeding with a survey of the interior of the House of Lords and its appurtenant accommodation, attention may be directed to the extensive suite of apartments which is situated in the long range of building which looks into Old Palace-yard, and forms, as has been said, the land-side frontage of the House of Lords. On reaching the top of the staircase which leads from the Peers' Entrance into the approaches to the House, it will be found that an extensive corridor stretches on the right to a door leading into St. Stephen's Hall, and on the left to the river front. On the ground-floor of this range are situated a number of rooms which are appropriated to the Lord Chancellor and his attendants, and to the Clerk of Parliaments. The Lord Chancellor's private room is exactly over the central porch, which forms the Peers' entrance in Old Palace-yard. It is a very handsome apartment, the ceiling being a remarkably superb specimen of the carving and gilding which characterises the general ornamentation of the House. The furniture and fittings are rich and appropriate, and the rooms will be ready for occupation by the meeting of Parliament. Over this suite of rooms, on the second floor, are placed the offices of the numerous coadjutors of the Clerk of Parliaments, and they are already occupied by their appointed tenants. In passing down the corridor on the right-hand side, and almost opposite the door of the Lord Chancellor's private room, there may be seen a large, lofty, and exquisitely-proportioned room, lighted solely from the roof, which is entirely composed of glass. It is not yet finished, but is fast approaching completion. It is understood that it is hereafter to be designated the "Painted Chamber," and will be used as a robing-room for Peers and for conferences between the two Houses. A few steps to the right of the door of this room in the corridor commence which leads straight into the lobby of the House of Lords and is intended as the passage by which the Lord Chancellor is to reach the House; so that, for the future, his diurnal procession will be similar to that of the Speaker of the Commons, who always makes his entry through the lobby and principal door of the House; whereas the Chancellor has hitherto marched down one of the private corridors of the House, and entered by a side-door at the bar. Thus much has been done towards the completion of the accommodation of the Peers within the Palace. The House of Commons, more fortunate than the Upper House, has long ceased to have its content with temporary accommodation; and nothing worthy of remark has been done in their House and its approaches.

Turning to the consideration of the mutations which have occurred among the chartered occupants of the Palace at Westminster it will be found that one branch of the Peerage has undergone changes by deaths amongst its members.

Since July last, of the Peers of England, Ireland, and Scotland, there have died one Duke, one Marquis, seven Earls, three Viscounts, one Bishop (two also have retired), and six Barons. The Duke of Rutland's is the most recent death. He is succeeded by his eldest son, the Marquis of Granby, M.P. for South Leicestershire. The Marquis of Queensberry, a Scotch Peer, has died, and has been succeeded by his eldest son, Lord Drumlanrig, late M.P. for Dumfriesshire. The premier Earldom of England has become extinct by the decease of the youthful Earl of Shrewsbury, without issue. This places the Earl of Derby at the head of the list of his order. The Earl of Bandon's death has taken Lord Bernard from the House of Commons; and a vacancy was also created among the representative Peers for Ireland, which has been filled up by the election of the Earl of Belmore. The Earl of Cork has been succeeded on his decease by Viscount Dungarvan, formerly member for Frome. The Earls of Digby and Scarborough have made way for their heirs-apparent; and the Earl of Listowel of the Peerage of Ireland, but who was not a member of the House of Peers has also passed away. The deaths amongst the Viscounts include that of Lord Hardinge, so well known as a gallant soldier, and who held the post of Commander-in-Chief until within a short time of his decease. He is succeeded by his eldest son, Viscount Maynard and Viscount Hawarden have also died during the recess: the latter was a representative Peer for Ireland, and his place has been supplied by the election of Viscount De Vesci. The Bishopric of Gloucester and Bristol having become vacant by the death of Dr. Monk, the see was conferred on Dr. Charles Baring, who will take his seat as Junior Bishop on the meeting of Parliament. The retirement of the Bishop of London has caused the appointment of Dr. Tait, late Dean of Carlisle, to the metropolitan see. As the Bishopric of London entitles the holder of it at once to a seat in the House of Lords, Dr Tait will take his place as a Peer of Parliament on the 3rd of next month. The translation of Dr. Longley to the Bishopric of Durham left vacant the diocese of Ripon. This has been conferred on the Rev. Robert Bickersteth, Rector of St. Giles's-in-the-Fields. Dr Longley would have been a permanent member of the House of Lords even if he had been appointed to any other Bishopric than that of Durham, which of itself entitles the holder of the see to the dignity of a Peer; but Dr. Bickersteth will not be entitled to a summons to the Upper House until the next vacancy on the right reverend bench. The Barons who have paid the debt of nature are Lord Lucas, Lord Boston, Lord Carew, Lord De Freyne, Lord Scarsdale, and Lord Milford: better known as Sir Richard Bulkeley Phillips, and who was long in the House of Commons as Member for Haverfordwest. Lord Milford having died without issue, his recently-created peerage has become extinct. Sir E. Lyons and Mr. Strutt will take their seats this Session as Lord Lyons and Lord Belper. This comprises the roll of changes in the constitution of the Upper House.

In the House of Commons there have been numerous changes. Several new members will take their seats at the commencement of the Session; while a number of new writs will be moved for, owing to resignations and appointments to office under the Crown. Mr. Pegge Burnell, during the recess, Member for Nottingham, a new writ having been moved for an election for that borough on the day Parliament was prorogued; a vacancy having occurred in the representation in consequence of Mr. Strutt having been elevated to the Peerage. Viscount Castlerosse having accepted the office of Comptroller of her Majesty's Household, a new writ was moved for a day or two before the vacation, for the election of a member for the county of Kerry, and his Lordship was re-elected without opposition. Since the prorogation of Parliament Lord Henniker has been elected member for the eastern division of the county of Suffolk, in the room of Sir Edward Gooch, Bart., deceased. Mr. Baillie Cochrane, who formerly represented Bridport, and who was a somewhat prominent member of that now extinct section of politicians which designated itself as "Young England," has been elected without opposition for the county of Lanark, in the place of Mr. William Lockhart, who died a few weeks since. Lord Castlerosse, Lord Henniker, Mr. Paget, and Mr. Baillie Cochrane will therefore be entitled to take their seats on the first day of the Session. On that day new writs will be moved for elections in various constituencies. The accession of Lord Bernard to the Earldom of Bandon makes a vacancy for the Irish borough of Bandon Bridge. His Lordship, during the time that Sir Robert Peel was in office, was considered to be one of that Minister's "young men," and often spoke in the discussions of the House. Since 1846 he has scarcely at all appeared in the character of a debater in the House. The advancement of Sir Alexander Cockburn to the Chief Justiceship of the Common Pleas renders a new writ necessary for the borough of Southampton; while Sir Richard Bethell's acceptance of the office of Attorney-General, and Mr. J. Stuart Wortley's appointment to that of Solicitor-General, cause temporary vacancies at Aylesbury and Bute shire respectively. There is little doubt of the re-election of both the law-officers of the Crown. Mr. William Bates, member for Newport, Isle of Wight, in consequence of his necessity of attending to his private affairs, resigns his seat. Mr. Biggs was attached to that party in Parliament which is Liberal of the extremest cast. On the few occasions on which he has addressed the House during his membership his speeches characterised by an eccentric boldness which generally gave rise to some amusement. The appointment of Mr. W. H. Watson to a Barony of the Exchequer makes a vacancy in the representation of the borough of Hull. A new writ has already been issued for the Irish borough of Downpatrick, the representation of which has been vacated by the accession to the Peerage of the Hon. Charles Hardinge, on the death of his father. The decease of Sir Edward Filmer, for many years member for West Kent, will have to be supplied immediately after the meeting of Parliament. The Marquis of Granby vacates North Leicestershire on becoming Duke of Rutland; and a new writ is issued for the room of Lord John Manners, who will contest that division of his native county, and if he is successful he will of necessity retire from the representation of the borough of Colchester. Lord Drumlanrig having acceded to the Scottish Marquisate of Queensberry will, on becoming a Peer of Parliament, it appears probable that a question would be raised as to the eligibility of a Scotch Peer to sit in the House of Commons. His Lordship [illegible] of the Treasury, announcing the necessity of re-election, and thereupon, no doubt, a new election for the county of Dumfries. Mr. John O'Connell, having published pamphlets containing [illegible] a new writ will be required to be moved for before the election can take place. Mr. Peter Rolt, the Conservative member for Greenwich, having taken the Chiltern Hundreds, a vacancy has occurred. Mr. C. Marsh, the once-eminent shipbuilder, has also taken on him certain partly-executed Government contracts, which circumstance implies the necessity of his resigning his seat, and his retirement from the House of Commons will be announced on the first day of the Session in the usual manner. The decease of a most active, useful, and respected member of the House of Commons, Mr Bankes, creates a vacancy in the representation of Salford. Few members of the House were more [illegible] withstanding his simple and unassuming manner, [illegible] more noticed, both by the conductors of its business and those who were merely observers of its proceedings. It is supposed that recent mercantile occurrences in connection with the Royal British Bank will lead Mr Humphrey Brown, member for Tewkesbury, to accept the Chiltern Hundreds, and so to return his trust into the hands of his constituency; and there is every probability that some action will be taken in the case of Mr. James Sadleir which will result in the issue of a new writ for the county of Tipperary.

From the above statement it will be seen that a little time must elapse before the Legislature will resume its normal condition, which has been in a great measure disturbed in various ways in a space of time which, counted even by weeks, is but brief. Notwithstanding many rumours to the contrary it appears that her Majesty's Ministers will meet Parliament constituted as they were when the Legislature was dismissed from its labours last year. Anticipation is rife in regard to the measures and discussions which will occupy the Parliament in the ensuing Session is unusually meagre. There will no doubt be debates—rather ex post facto in their nature on our foreign policy in Europe; while the state of affairs in the East, as regards both Persia and China, will certainly be brought under consideration at an early day. The Income-tax, as it now exists, will, without doubt, be impeached; Church rates will be [illegible] proposals are made the subject of attack; the Corporation of the City of London will have to undergo a process of reform; the Ecclesiastical Courts, and the Law of Marriage and Divorce it is understood, will be dealt with by a measure which is the result of a compromise of all the promoters of bills on this head; other Law Reforms, it is stated, are to be brought into the legislative cruel: a measure for the extension of national education is to be introduced by Sir John Pakington and Mr. Cobden—a compromise having also been effected between several independent and somewhat diverse holders of opinions on this important question. Besides all this there are a dozen or two of minor bills which the Government had to postpone last year. These are supposed to originate with the monopoly of certain large towns on the coast, under the title of Local Dues, will be renewed. Of systematic and organised party movements, or an avowed struggle for power and place—at present, one hears nothing. The only intention of any such [illegible] can be found in a report that Mr. Disraeli has avowed his intention of making Sir Robert Peel's lecture on Russia the subject of a vigorous personal attack on the honourable Baronet himself and on the Government that has not taken any public step to correct [illegible] members.

It [illegible] the Session of [illegible] who [illegible] and [illegible] between [illegible] opinion [illegible] a hot contest, and the seeds of many a change—ministerial, political, and social.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Lord John Russell, M.P., arrived in town on Tuesday evening from Florence, in order to attend to his Parliamentary duties.

Viscount Palmerston is, we are glad to say, recovered from his recent attack of gout.

The health of the Queen of Spain is rapidly improving. Her Majesty is going to Andalusia, whither Narvaez will accompany her.

Count Walewski gave a ball last Monday night, at which Ferouk Khan and all the foreign Ministers in Paris, with the exception of Lord Cowley, were present.

The latest accounts from Harewood House, Yorkshire, are of a somewhat favourable character as respects the Earl of Harewood, who suffered a fracture of the skull while hunting on Saturday last.

The King of Prussia and the Princes had a shooting party on the Schöneberg plain on the 24th inst., and bagged not less than 250 hares in three hours. The plain, richly cultivated, is within a mile of the city gates, but, notwithstanding this, is most strictly preserved.

MM. de Pourtales and Corriolis, late prisoners at Neufchâtel, have arrived at Marseilles.

His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Ferns and Leighlin, the Bishop of Down, and the Bishop of Cloyne and Cork, will be the representative Bishops in the coming session of Parliament.

Sir James Hudson, British Minister; the Duke of Grammont, French Minister; M. Brenier de Saint Simon, Prussian Minister; M. ## NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE Admiralty have recently had under consideration plans and estimates for the permanent enlargement and improvement of the dockyard at Pembroke. At their last visit the Lords or the Admiralty closely inspected the shore from the eastern Martello tower to Hobbs-point, with the view of ascertaining how far this space of ground could be made available for the dockyard enlargement. A portion of the dockyard [illegible] will be included in the Navy estimates for the present year. [illegible] is to be extended more considerably than at first intended. It is to have an additional length of nearly 200 feet, which is to be carried out both inland and seaward. The building-slips are receiving an extra length of eighty feet towards the sea, and new ones are being erected. The enlargement of the roads is also taking place. The present area of the dockyard is about ninety acres; yet, as new buildings are being rapidly added, this large acreage will soon be insufficient for the dockyard requirements.

EVERY exertion has been made to discover the two men, attired in the uniform of the Royal Artillery, who recently robbed Colonel Gordon, but hitherto without effect. In justice to the corps, it may be observed that it is by no means certain that the fellows who attended Colonel Gordon were artillerymen. It is the opinion of several acute detective police officers that the contrary was the case; and it is well known that old uniforms are publicly sold, and frequently worn by people in Woolwich by those who might find it convenient to assume such a disguise.

THE Duke of Cambridge having consented that a number of the invalid soldiers at the Military Hospital, Chatham, should be sent to Bath for the purpose of undergoing a course of medical treatment in that city, arrangements have been made for stationing invalid troops in that neighbourhood.

DISPATCHES have been received at Chatham by Captain Allan, in charge of the Admiralty pilot vessels now employed from Kertch by the Turkish Engineer Corps, and deposited on the gun-wharf, to deliver the entire stores, with the exception of the large pontoons, to the Royal Engineers, with Bonds, on board the vessel in the act of bringing to that corps. On opening the casks and boxes in which the harness, tools, and other articles were deposited in the summer, it was found that they had not suffered in any degree from the effects of their long exposure in their partly unprotected state, care having been taken to oil and cleanse from damp every article separately before it was deposited in the place assigned to it. The pontoons will remain on the gun-wharf, owing to there being no place large enough to receive them.

NEVER LOOK A GIFT HORSE IN THE MOUTH.—Lieutenant d'Alvenslehen went some months ago to Trieste, and thence to Alexandria, to receive four Arabian horses which the Viceroy of Egypt intended as a present for the King of Prussia. The return of the animals, which was to have taken place last month, has been delayed by a singular circumstance. When he saw the horses, he found them of so little value that he did not think it his duty to undertake the expense of their conveyance to Prussia. It appears that they had been exchanged on their way from the interior, for it could not be supposed that the Viceroy would send to the King horses which were old and blind.—Borsenhalle.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

ALL National Securities have been dull and drooping in price during the present week. Some large sales of money stocks having been effected, and over £400,000 in gold having been withdrawn from the Bank of England, chiefly to purchase silver on the Continent, the bulk operators have taken alarm; and the difference between the value of Consols for Money and time is now only one-eighth per cent. The warlike news from India and China, although one despatch states that our differences with Persia have been adjusted, has produced a feeling of insecurity in the investment in the silver market, and prices are expected to go higher, owing to intelligence having come to hand that money was comparatively scarce in India, and that the treasure tanks had further increased the rates of discount.

The Money Market here has been very active, and numerous applications have been made for assistance at the Bank of England, as well as to the private bankers—the latter of whom are charging one quarter per cent for the best short paper. At present there is every indication of higher rates. Gold is leaving us rapidly; the stock at the Bank of France is declining; and there are very large amounts of bullion and specie coming to-hand from any quarter for some time. Gold is much dearer in the Continental money [illegible] to-day than it was in London for instance, [illegible] and [illegible] in Paris, [illegible] at Hamburgh, and the exchanges at New York and Boston [illegible] ments. There is only one steamer due [illegible] from Australia known to have gold on board. As [illegible] France is still a buyer of gold, no doubt the whole of the supply by that conveyance will be taken for the Continent.

The imports of gold and silver this week have been under £200,000. The arrivals from New York was on French account. We may, therefore, anticipate a gradual decline in the stock in the Bank of England, and with it a hardening Money Market.

The annexed return exhibits the total note circulation of the United Kingdom during the four weeks ending on the 20th ult.:

|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Bank of England | .. | .. | .. | .. | £18,975,[illegible] |

| Ireland | .. | .. | .. | .. | 7,397,353 |
| Total | .. | .. | .. | .. | £37,375,237 |

Compared with the previous month, the decrease in the circulation is three £1.

From Hamburg, we learn that the rate of discount has fallen to 6½ per cent.

On Monday Home Stocks were very flat and drooping. The Account dealings were unusually small:—The Three per Cents Reduced were 93¾, 94; Three per Cent Consols, 93⅞ ⅞; New Three per Cents, 94¾, 94; Long Annuities, 1860, 2⅛; Annuities, 1885, 19 1-16; Exchequer Bills, 1s. dis. to 3s. prem. Very limited transactions were reported on the following day, and prices were rather easier:—Bank Stock, 214 to 213; Three per Cents Reduced, 93⅝ ⅞, three per cent down to 93⅜; Consols, for Money, 93⅜ to ⅝; Ditto, for Account, 93⅜ ⅝; New Three per Cents, 94⅜ ⅝ to 93⅝; New Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 91 to 90; India Bonds, 2s. dis.; Exchequer Bills, 1s. to 2s. dis.; Exchequer Bonds, 98¾. Wednesday's transactions were trifling, as follows:—Bank Stock, 215 to 213½; Three per Cents Reduced, 93⅝ ⅞; Three per Cent Consols, 93⅜ ⅝; Ditto, for Account, 93⅜ ⅝; New Three per Cents, 93⅞, 94; New Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 78½; Long Annuities, 1860, 2⅛; Ditto, 2 11-16; Ditto, 1885, 18 15-16; India Stock, 219; India Bonds, 2s. prem.; Exchequer Bills, 1s. to 2s. dis.; Exchequer Bonds, 98¾.

On Thursday the Directors of the Bank of England made no change in the rate of discount [illegible] Consol Market was exceedingly heavy, at further depressed rates. The transactions for Money were 93⅜ ⅝; and for Account, 93⅝ ⅞; for the March settlement the quotations were 93⅞. The New Three per Cents marked 93⅝ ⅞; the Reduced, 93⅝ ⅞; Long Annuities, 1885, 19 1-16; Bank Stock, 216 to 217½; Exchequer Bills, 5s. to 1s. dis.; India Bonds, 2s. dis.

[illegible] the Foreign Market. The business [illegible] Spanish Passive, 19¼; Ditto Certificates, 4½; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 59½; Ditto Four per Cents, 90; Belgian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 90; Ditto Four per Cents, 84; Brazilian Five per Cents, 99½; Ditto Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 89½; Buenos Ayres Six per Cents, 84½; Spanish Committee Certificates of Coupon, 5 per cent, 20¾; Ditto Three per Cents, 44½; Turkish Four per Cents, 103; Venezuela Four-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 36½; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 60½; Danish Five per Cents, 103; Mexican Three per Cents, 21½; Ditto Five per Cents, 30½; Chilian Six per Cents, 104½; Dutch Four per Cents, 98¾

Owing to the unusually favourable reports presented at the half-yearly meetings and the increase in the dividends, all Joint-Stock Bank Shares have ruled very firm, and the quotations have had an upward [illegible] Bank of Australasia have marked 84½; Bank of Egypt, 18¾; Commercial of London, 18½; English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered, 74½; General Steam Navigation, 11½; London Chartered of Australia, 17½; Ditto, New [illegible] 3¾; London and Westminster, 53½; London Joint-Stock, 14½; London and Provincial Marine, 3½; London Provincial of Ireland, 55½; Union of Australia, 93¾; Union of London, 34¾; Universal Life, 3½; Unity Mutual, 40; and Western of London, 48¾.

The Railway Share market has likewise been comparatively quiet. Prices, however, have been tolerably steady:—London Docks, 109 ex div.; East and West India, 122; St. Katharine, 94; Southampton, 94; Victoria, 18½; Shefford and Worcester Canal, 440; Regent, 15½; Warwick and Birmingham, 25.

All Railway Shares have been very flat, and prices have given way. The "calls" for February, so far as they have been yet ascertained, are £277,939. The following are the official closing money quotations on Thursday:—

ORDINARY SHARES AND STOCKS.—Eastern Counties, 0; East Lancashire, 84¾; Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee, 34; Great Northern, A Stock, 79; Great Western, 65¾; London and Brighton, 112¾; London and North-Western, 106¾; London and South-Western, 107; Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, 33¾; Midland, 82¾; Norfolk, 53; North-Eastern (Berwick), 83½; Ditto, G. The Mining Share Market has been tolerably steady. On Thursday Alfred Consols were done at 21¾; Great Wheal Alfred, 10¾; North Wheal Basset, 38¾; United Mines, 21½; St. John del Rey, 17; and Cobre Copper, 58¾.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE, January 26.—Only moderate supplies of English wheat, in damp condition, were received up to our market this morning, nevertheless, the demand for all kinds ruled heavy, at somewhat lower rates, as did our inquiries compared with the previous week. Foreign met from 3s. to 4s. per quarter. Foreign wheat—the show of which was extensive—met a dull sale, at quite 2s. per quarter less money. We were fairly supplied with both English and foreign barley, in which very little was passing, at 2s. per quarter decline. Malt ruled heavy, at barely stationary prices. There was only a limited inquiry for oats, the value of which had a downward tendency. Both beans and peas were dull, and quite 1s. per quarter lower. Town-made flour was unchanged; but country marks and American qualities gave way 2s. per sack and barrel report was [illegible]

Canada.—Scarcely any change took place in the prices of produce to-day. The business done was confined to immediate wants.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 49s. to 49s.; ditto, white, 50s. to 56s.; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 48s. to 49s.; ditto, white, 52s. to 53s.; grinding barley, 30s. to 32s.; distilling ditto, 34s. to 35s.; malting ditto, 37s. to 39s.; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 56s. to 58s. brown ditto, 52s. to 54s.; Lincoln and Ware, 60s. to 70s.; Chevalier, 72s. to 77s.; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 24s. to 25s.; potato do. to 26s. to 32s.; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s. to 23s.; ditto, white, 24s. to 28s.; Limerick, 23s. to 26s.; grey peas, 37s. to 38s.; maple, 39s. to 40s.; beans, 38s. to 40s.; tick beans, 38s. to 40s.; per quarter. Town-made flour, 50s. to 53s.; Suffolk, 42s. to 45s.; Stockton and Yorkshire, 40s. to 42s. per 280 lb. American flour, 21s. to 23s. per barrel.

Seeds.—Limited as a good request, and rather dearer. Cloverseed, fine, trefoil, and canary, command extreme rates. Other seeds are unaltered.

Linseed, English crushing, 56s. to 58s.; Mediterranean and Odessa, 51s. to 53s.; hempseed, 47s. to 48s.; cake, £8 10s. to £8 15s. per ton. Rapeseed, English refined, £24 to £25; foreign, £23 to £24; cake, £8 to £8 5s. per ton. Canary, 65s. to 70s. per quarter.

Flour.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis range from 9d. to 9½d.; of households ditto, 7½d. to 8½d. per lb. loaf.

Imported Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 55s. 10d.; barley, 35s. 1d.; oats, 23s. 8d.; rye, 37s. 8d.; beans, 40s. 8d.; peas, 39s. 9d.

Duties.—Foreign wheat, 9s. 2d.; barley, 4s. 9d.; oats, 2s. 1d.; rye, 3s. 9d.; beans, 4s.; peas, 4s.

Imports into London last Week.—Wheat, 108,832 barley, 25,676; oats, 18,406; rye, 210; peas, 1,120; beans, 2,130 quarters.

Tea.—The last mail news from China has been productive of considerable excitement in our markets, and of an important rise in the quotations. Common sound congou has advanced to 1s. 1½d. per lb. The public sales have gone at a considerable advance.

Sugar.—An extensive business has been transacted in refined goods, at full quotations, at an advance of from 6d. to fully 1s. per cwt.—West India has realised 51s. to 57s. Mauritius, 45s. to 48s. 6d.; Bengal, 42s. 6d. to 43s.; Madras, 40s. 6d. to 42s.; Manilla, 40s. to 41s. per cwt. Refined goods have risen 1s. per cwt., present rates being from 61s. to 62s. per cwt.

Coffee.—Native qualities have changed hands 1s. per cwt. All other coffees are quite as dear as last week.

Rice.—Large supplies have been brought to public sale, and the demand has fallen off; prices have, hence, rarely ruled in favour of buyers.

Provisions.—Irish butter is very dull, and drooping in price. In English and foreign qualities very little is doing, at barely late rates. Bacon is dull, but we have no actual change to notice in its value. Other provisions are [illegible]

Tallow.—All kinds are steady, and P.Y.C., on the spot, is worth 62s 3d. per cwt. for present and March delivery. The stock is very limited.

Oils.—Linseed oil has sold readily, at £29 to £29 10s. per ton on the spot. Olive and rape support last week's prices. Turpentine is inactive, at 42s. to 42s. 6d. per cwt. for spirits.

Spirits.—Very little is doing in rum, yet the late improvement in value is supported. Proof Leewards, 2s. 2d.; and East India, 2s. 6½d. per gallon. Brandy is dull, yet the finest old parcels cannot be purchased under 14s. 6d. per gallon. Malt spirit, proof, 11s. 2d. per gallon.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 10s. to £4 5s.; clover ditto, £3 10s. to £5 5s., and straw, £1 4s. to £1 8s. per load.

Coals.—Wylam, 16s.; Lawson, 16s. 6d.; Riddell, 16s. 9d.; Eden Main, 17s. 6d.; Belmont, 18s.; Hetton, 18s.; Lambton, 18s. 6d. Montagues, 17s. 6d.; Stewart Hetton, 18s. 9d. per ton.

Wool.—No new average business is doing in hops, at last week's rates. Mid and East Kent, £3 5s. to £5 15s.; Weald of Kent, £3 5s. to £4 10s.; Sussex, £3 0s. to £3 10s.; and Yearlings, £1 10s. to £3 3s. per cwt.

Wool.—The demand is active, and prices generally are well supported.

Potatoes.—The supplies are moderate, and the trade is easily, at from 70s. to 130s. per ton.

Metropolitan Cattle Market.—Most kinds of stock have been in limited supply and moderate request, at last week's quotations.

Beef, from 3s. 4d. to 5s. 0d.; mutton, 4s. 0d. to 5s. 6d.; veal, 4s. 6d. to 5s. 6d.; pork, 3s. 8d. to 5s. 6d. per 8 lb., by the stale the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—The trade generally has ruled steadily, as follows:—

Beef, from 3s. 4d. to 4s. 6d.; mutton, 3s. 6d. to 4s. 10d.; veal, 4s. 0d. to 5s. 0d.; pork, 3s. 8d. to 5s. 4d. per 8 lb., by the carcase.

THE MILTON VASE.

THIS interesting work of sculpture attracted much admiration at the last exhibition of the Royal Academy. The vase is 4 feet 5 inches in height. The subjects illustrate "Paradise Lost." The panel engraved shows Michael leading Adam and Eve out of Paradise; the fiery sword waving behind them, and the cherubim guarding the place.—

> Haste thee, and from the Paradise of God
> Drive out the sinful pair
> All terror hide
> If patiently thy bidding they obey:
> Dismiss them not disconsolate. Book II.

The opposite side shows the overthrow of Satan and his legions'—

> Go then, thou mightiest, in thy father's might,
> Pursue these sons of darkness, drive them out
> From all heaven's bounds into the utter deep.
> Book VI.

The handle is supported by masks of Sin and Death, with foliage of the deadly nightshade. Under the lip are masks of Envy, Hatred, Fear, and Despair, with foliage of wild plants. The entire design is of classic character.

The Vase is the joint production of two rising young artists, T. and W. J. Wills, of Harrison-street, Gray's-inn-road. We are glad to see artistic skill applied to works of this class. the present design, if carried out in terra-cotta, would form a grand object for a garden or lawn.

THE MILTON VASE.

FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

FOR some time past the changes in fashion at least, in as far as regards general forms—have not presented any very marked or decided character; novelty has been chiefly limited to matters of detail, or to what may properly be called the ornamentation of dress. Now, however, a revolution, and an important one, is impending—viz., an enlargement of the size of bonnets. Symptoms of this change have, as yet, been perceptible only in the sphere of ultra-Parisian fashion; yet there is little doubt that the year 1857 will witness its consummation. The change in question has, in fact, become indispensable, inasmuch as there seems to be every disposition to increase rather than to diminish the amplitude of skirts or the profusion of flounces. Good taste demands a certain harmony in the different parts of a lady's dress—a harmony of proportion as well as of colour. Now the diminutive bonnet, hanging at the back of the head, in the style in which it has been worn during the last two or three years, is manifestly out of proportion to the mass of silk, lace, and other trimmings comprising a fashionable dress. The necessity of obviating this disproportion suggested the enlargement of sleeves, by the addition of puffs, frills, &c., which give to the arm its required degree of importance in connection with the ample and highly-trimmed jupe.

Flounces of black or white lace are very fashionable for evening dresses, flounces of the same material as the robe being now confined chiefly to morning or out-door costume. Robes with double or triple skirts have a very elegant effect, as they admit of a vast variety of rich and fanciful trimmings.

A style of trimming for which there is just now quite a furore in Paris is distinguished by the designation quilles. It is employed for dresses of various materials (whether having one or more skirts), and it consists of pieces of silk, satin, velvet, or any other material, broad at the base and tapering to a point at the top, the precise form being accurately expressed by the French term quille (skittle). Each quille is usually five or six inches broad at the base, and the intervening spaces are about the same width. These quilles are disposed longitudinally on the skirts of dresses, frequently extending from the lower edge to nearly the height of the waist. The edges of the quilles are trimmed with narrow lace, fringe, or passementerie. Frequently two or three quilles are placed at each side of the skirt, and they are connected together by rows of lace, ruches of narrow ribbon, or with jet trimmings. This sort of trimming may be executed in any material or in any colour. Quilles of black velvet, on violet-colour moire, have a beautiful effect, and form a dress suitable for out-door costume.

In the shape of bonnets but little or no change is perceptible. They continue to be very highly trimmed; indeed, so profusely ornamented, that it is frequently difficult to determine of what material the bonnet itself is composed. At the present season rich and somewhat dark hues are, of course, most prevalent. Velvet is rapidly regaining favour as a material for bonnets. For carriage costume a bonnet of blue, brown, or green velvet, trimmed with black lace, chenille, &c., and having on one side a bird of paradise, is extremely elegant. Bonnets of a plainer style, suitable for walking dress, are frequently made of black velvet, and trimmed with bands or rouleaux of coloured velvet—as green, violet, or dark blue. The effect thus produced is very pretty.

Our Illustrations comprise three figures—two ladies and a gentleman. The costumes of the ladies have been drawn from dresses just completed in the elegant magasin des modes of Madame E. DEVY, 73, Lower Grosvenor-street.

The ball dress is of white tarlatan, with five flounces, edged with white silk fringe, headed by a row of plaid velvet ribbon. The corsage is of the fashionable square shape, trimmed with ribbon and fringe. The head-dress consists of a lappet of white lace and a cache-peigne bouquet of variegated roses.

The out-door dress is of dark lilac taffeta, and has three flounces, edged with embroidery in shades of violet silk. The mantle, of black velvet, is trimmed with tassel fringe. The bonnet is of white terry velvet, trimmed with lilac feathers and blonde.

It has heretofore been our practice to confine our Illustrations of fashion chiefly to ladies' and children's costume; inasmuch as the unpicturesque and ungraceful male garb of the present time offers nothing that is worthy of being either delineated or described. However, our group of figures this day includes a very elegant costume of a cavalier of the reign of Charles II. We offer it suggestively to the younger portion of our male readers, even at the hazard of incurring the displeasure of "respectable elderly gentlemen," one of whom has recently, in the columns of the Times, expressed his horror at the encroaching luxury of velvet and brocade. Nevertheless, we trust our Illustrations may furnish a few useful hints to those lords of creation who consider it their duty to bestow attention on the "outer man," and who suffer under the infliction of being obliged to disfigure themselves in the inconvenient and unbecoming garb which modern custom enjoins. We neither expect nor recommend any gentleman, however adventurous, to adopt all at once an innovation in costume such as might naturally enough lead to the conviction that he had doffed his strait-waistcoat too soon. It is well to bear in mind the admonition of the poet, who wisely says:—

> Be not the first by whom the new is tried,
> Nor yet the last to lay the old aside.

Desirable modifications may, however, be introduced partially and gradually; and surely any change in the male costume of modern Europe can scarcely be for the worse.

The cavalier's costume is composed of very rich materials, and exhibits a glowing combination of colour. The cloak is of dark blue velvet, lined with amber silk. The doublet, of violet-colour satin, is richly embroidered and laced with gold; and the sleeves, which are turned up with broad vevers of blue silk, show under-sleeves of fine white lawn, in two large full puffs, with narrow ruffles of vandyked lace turned up. The loose short hose of pink cashmere are edged and trimmed with blue fringe. The flesh-coloured silk stockings are confined below the knees by garters of black velvet, fastened by bows of pink ribbon with flowing ends. The shoes have pink heels, and are fastened by large shoe-knots of pink ribbon. The hat, of grey felt, is trimmed round the crown by a puffing of blue ribbon, and has on one side a rose-colour ostrich feather.

MOLDAVIA AND WALLACHIA.—A letter from Jassy dated the 7th inst., and received in Paris, states that, in consequence of despatches received from Paris, Colonel Besson, the French commissioner for defining the boundaries, set out immediately for Bessarabia. It was believed that the boundary line of the new frontier would be completely terminated in twenty-five or thirty days. Consequently the evacuation of the provinces by the Austrian troops might be commenced at the beginning of February, so as to be concluded by the 1st of March, the period at which a thaw generally commences in those countries. The present season was as favourable as possible for the movement troops, the roads being in excellent order.

THE AUSTRIAN EMPEROR AT MILAN.—The Milan Gazette of the 19th inst., after announcing four pardons granted to Italian refugees, and eighteen more to persons whose names are not Italian, gives an account of the visit of the Emperor to various public offices and institutions viz., to the Imperial Lieutenancy; the Provincial Delegation, where a splendid album, by Milanese artists, was presented to him; and then to the Institute of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts and Trades, where his Majesty was received by the President, Count Taverna, who had a conversation of some duration with the Emperor on the objects and progress of the establishment

FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

SWORD PRESENTED TO GENERAL LA MARMORA.

THE presentation of this superb tribute to the patriotism of La Marmora originated as follows:—In the course of the year 1855 a national subscription was opened in Piedmont to present to the Sardinian army then serving in the Crimea a liberal supply of woollen shirts, cigars, and sundry other articles for the comfort of the troops. At the conclusion of peace the committee who had been charged with the distribution of the funds collected for the above purpose determined to devote a part of the residue to the presentation of a sword to General La Marmora, who, in command of the Sardinian army in the East, had so largely contributed to win new laurels for the flag of Savoy. This proposition was received with great satisfaction by the subscribers, and a very able artist was charged with the execution of the sword. The illustration shows the handle and hilt of the sword, which is a fine specimen of ornamentation. The female figure represents Italy: in her left hand she holds the national flag, and in her right one the lictor's fasces, emblematic of union. The sword has lately been presented to General La Marmora, and has been received by him with an assurance of his grateful feeling for this splendid national testimonial.

In Gallenga's "History of Piedmont," published in 1855, we find the following recognition of the patriotic services of this distinguished General:—

The genius of one man, Alfonso La Marmora, has done more for the security of his country than could have been achieved by the construction of any number of impregnable bastions. La Marmora has regenerated the army of Piedmont. Appointed to the Ministry of War since November, 1848, he brought into every branch of his administration an energy and activity equally characteristic of himself and of every member of his brave family. He reformed the staff by the whole-sale dismissal of decrepid disabled, or incapable officers, utterly regardless of personal favour or court patronage, perfectly unmoved by senseless popular outcry. By the enforcement of a strict, impartial rule by all grades, reform of the educational system in military colleges by a constant call upon the mental and bodily exertions both of soldiers and officers he produced, in less than six years, the most civilised as well as the best disciplined army that ever could be organised out of Italian elements. That army—or part of it, though by no means as it was supposed, the élite of it, for it was draughted by battalions or companies out of every corps—he has now taken under his guidance to the Crimea; and a first encounter on the banks of the Tchernaya (August 16th, 1855) seems to have justified the most sanguine expectations, both of the Minister himself and of the country. It is truly auspicious, no less than remarkable, that the same La Marmora who had the good fortune to save his King's life in the midst of the turmoil of Milan in 1848, who preserved the integrity of the Monarchy by stifling the insurrectionary movement at Genoa in 1849, should be charged with the honour of the national arms in 1855.

THE ENGLISH HOUSE IN DANTZIC.

THIS is an interesting specimen of the picturesque street architecture of the ancient town of Dantzic, noted for its fine old style of building. The lofty gabled façade is upwards of four centuries old: it was built in the year 1440, by the Guild of English Cloth Merchants, as their dépôt and place of business. The front has never undergone any alteration, and is now as it was erected. The house has for the last century been used as an hotel, &c. the best in the city; frequented by the officers of the English fleet when any of the ships put into Dantzic.

PORTABLE SCHOOL.

WHILE we possess portable buildings for nearly all kinds of purposes, there seems to be no reason why this species of accommodation should not be extended to the business of education. Mr. Robert Ault, a builder, at Stourbridge, has the merit of this new application. He has erected at Wordsley, in Staffordshire, a school-room of this kind. It is called a portable school-room, because its sides, ends, roof, and floor are formed in compartments screwed together, which can be taken to pieces, and removed to any other site. It is 24 feet long, 16 feet wide, and 8 feet high to the springing of the roof. The roof is open to the ridge, which is 16 feet from the floor. The whole is constructed of timber, and capable of holding 100 children. A composition has been applied to the exterior, which renders it quite weatherproof. It is well warmed, with one cwt. of coals per week, by a new kind of stove; which together with the whole building, was designed by Mr. F. Smalman Smith, architect, Stourbridge, and was made by Mr. Ault for the sum of £60, including a belfry and shutters. Such a school-room would be very useful where a site or funds are difficult to obtain, or where the ground is undermined, or the population fluctuating. This schoolroom has been provided to accommodate a mixed school, in a newly-built district, for which a permanent building will be erected as soon as the title of the site can be made clear, when it will be removed to another part of the parish, to serve the purpose of a Ragged School.

This novelty in building has received the following testimonial from the Board of Education:—

Education Department, Council Office, Downing-street, London, January 23rd, 1857.

I have examined the Portable School designed by Mr. Smalman Smith (for the district of California, in Wordsley parish), and it seemed to me ingeniously contrived, firmly constructed and admirably adapted to meet the wants of a neighbourhood where there is a difficulty in obtaining a secure site for building purposes. The school seemed to stand quite securely and to be perfectly weather-tight. There would, I should say, be no difficulty as to proper ventilation of such a room, nor as to fitting it up in such a manner as that the best plans of school organisation might be carried out in it.

H. J. SANDFORD, Assistant Inspector of Schools.

RUSKIN ON TURNER'S PICTURE OF THE GODDESS OF DISCORD IN THE GARDEN OF THE HESPERIDES.

IN another part of our Journal will be found an engraving of the Goddess of Discord in the Garden of the Hesperides. It may not be uninteresting to the reader to know what Mr. Ruskin says of this picture. Mr Ruskin is, unquestionably, the most brilliant English prose-writer of the middle of the nineteenth century. With much less of that high pressure which in many of Mr. Macaulay's most striking productions leaves on the reader an unpleasant sensation of effort, Ruskin surpasses him in effective power. Ruskin is less emphatic; but there is a curious felicity in his power that makes the reader feel that when he takes pen in hand the English language becomes to him like clay in the hands of a skilful potter.

Ruskin's system of art-criticism is sound: throwing aside the whole modern school, from Diderot, with his intellectual grasp, to Waagen, with his technical scholarship, he takes a free glance at not only the aspects but the fundamental framework of nature, and then applies his tests to modern art with a freedom unparalleled. Never was there in art such an iconoclast; only the Aristotelian acuteness of his observation, and the refreshing originality and fulminating force of his style, procure pardon for the way in which he lays about him.

Strange to say, it is on this occasion a noble monument of Turner which we must defend against this sinewy image-breaker.

We cannot accept (says Ruskin, in his recent pamphlet*) the impossibilities of mountain form into which the wretched system of Poussin's idealism moulded Turner's memory of the Alps. It is not possible that hill masses on this scale should be divided into those simple, steep, and stonelike forms. Great mountains, however bold, are always full of endless fracture and detail, and indicate on their brows and edges of their cliffs both the multitudinousness and the deeply-wearing continuance of the force of time, and stream, and tempest.

Poussin may, and does, lie open to this charge. Still more so Salvator, with his Calabrian school of mountain idealism. But, as regards this picture of Turner, we may ask if the Garden of the Hesperides was in the Rhetian Alps or in Africa? No doubt that, as a representation of Swiss scenery, it is false. No doubt that in the Swiss mountains, as well as in the Apennines (a warmer region, but exposed to the humidity generated by two seas), there is all that trituration by rain and snow of which he speaks. But any one who has seen African mountains must admit that they are much sharper and more stone-like. Mr. Ruskin must have seen drawings of Sinai and Gebal Sahili, the Eastern prolongations of the Atlas. (We do not allude to hills that have been artificially cut.) How much sharper are mountains like these than the Alps: and even in the Western Atlas the ruin and snow, and consequent trituration, are a mere tithe of these agencies in Switzerland.

Mr. Ruskin then proceeds to treat of the want of grass and of the superabundant brown in this African landscape. But this is the very highest compliment that can be paid to Turner. In African landscape the trees are green; but the earths, even in professed gardens, and all mountains, are generally most unpleasantly brown.

Mr. Ruskin then goes on to depict by the help of his own brilliant imagination a fancy garden of the Hesperides out of the components of Swiss scenery, complaining, to begin with, that "Poussin kept Turner for twenty years from seeing that grass was green." We can only say that if such a landscape were painted as an African one it would

"astonish the natives" if shown to them. Even if Turner were wrong in his physical geography, is there no latitude in a garden guarded by a dragon? But we pardon all Mr. Ruskin's cavils in reading his appreciation of Turner's [illegible] "astonish the natives" if shown to them. MESSIAH, from MOZART'S SCORE newly arranged by JOHN BISHOP in Vocal Score, with Piano or Organ Accompaniment, complete, with Book of Words, 5s. only. "At the recent performance of Messiah" we were glad to see so many wrong the audience reading, not from the shipwreck books of the world's wreck, but from a handy cloth volume, just from the score published by Messrs Robert Cocks and Co., containing about 80 pages, admirably printed, correct in every particular, and of which the price was but 5s. The publishers who supply so sensible a work at such a trifling cost deserve the support of the public, and must obtain it if they are to continue their enterprise."—Vide Dublin Daily Express, Jan. 16.—N.B. CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE, price Fifty Guineas. This instrument has (unlike the ordinary Cottage Pianoforte) a three Octaves and the Entire Chromatic compass of Seven Octaves. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear and tear, and perform in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and clear, and the power equal to that of a Rickord Grand. The case is of the most elegant construction, in rosewood, the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to render the standing well in tune. Chappell and Co. especially invite the attention of the public, the profession, and connoisseurs, to this Model, feeling assured that no Pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Descriptive Lists may be had gratis, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase.—50, New Bond-street, London.

MASTER WALTER, THE PHYSICIAN.

A TALE OF OLD LONDON.

IT was on a Sunday afternoon, in the summer of the year 1264, and during our third Henry's reign, that the Rabbi Elias, and his daughter Muriel, sat in an upper chamber of their house in Coleman-street. The Rabbi was not only Presbyter (or, as he was more commonly called in the legal instruments of the day, Episcopus of all the Jews of England), but Registrar of the Chirographs of the Jews of London—that is, of all bonds, deeds, and notes of hand, which had passed from Christians to Jews in return for loans, the faithful record of which, as kept by the Rabbi Elias and his brother chirographers, served as a register of the property of the Jews, and as a guide to the Monarch, when he wished to impose a tallage upon their wealthy race; and, in order to ensure the registration of such property, it was enacted that no bond or deed should be received as valid unless it had been registered.

Had the wealth of the Rabbi Elias been at all commensurate with the importance of his offices, or with the esteem in which he was held by his people, his house would have displayed something more than the plain though neat and scrupulously clean furniture with which it was rather sparingly provided. For there was a strength and solidity in the houses of the Jews, as well in London as in every other large town throughout the land, which presented a strong contrast to the frailty of the crumbling wooden tenements in which many even of the wealthiest of the Christian burghers dwelt; and which, if by good fortune they escaped the frequent fires to which the City was exposed, were pretty sure to fall victims to another element, and terminate their precarious existence in a storm. Any one who had compared the handsome stone edifices in the Jewry (that tract of the City which was bounded by the Walbrook and Milk-street on the east and west, and by Cheapside and the City wall on the south and north) with most of the dwellings in the other parts of the town, would assuredly have come to the conclusion that the Christian owners of these last were the perpetual wanderers through the dreary wilderness of the world—the restless pilgrims, who cared not to build for their brief sojourn any dwelling more durable than a tent; and that the Jews, who had constructed such solid and substantial habitations, were the real lords of the soil, certain of their peaceful settlement in the land, and free from all apprehension of disturbance or change. True it is that the wisdom of Fitz-Alwin, the first Mayor of London, had devised a scheme to tempt and persuade the citizens into the use of stone in the construction of their dwellings; but the public disturbances of many succeeding years furnished the too conservative Londoners with an excuse for persistence in their long-cherished customs; and they were never well provided with stone houses until the reign of Edward I., when the banishment of the Jews, and the confiscation of their property, supplied the Christians with excellent buildings at the lowest possible cost. Nor was the furniture of these Jewish houses at all inferior to their external appearance. It was not only that the rude bench, which contented the free citizen, was covered with silken cushions by those who were so contemptuously styled the "King's Chattels;" or that, while the burgher, so tenacious of his charters and liberties, drank from the hooped pot, or not too highly-polished horn, the outcast had his vessels of silver and his vessels of gold. There were signs of refinement, as well as of wealth, in the dwellings of the Jew—plain marks of a better breeding, proofs that the owners were conscious of a higher lineage than their oppressors could boast, and of an intellectual training such as few Christians had undergone; and many evidences of their commerce with that sunny land of Spain, amongst whose olive groves, and vineyards, burning plains, steep hills, and fertile vales, they had for a time realised the traditional beauty and fertility of the Palestine which their fathers had lost. Thence they had brought with them Moorish water-coolers, which were all but useless in this cold northern clime; thence came the skill to trace the delicate arabesques with which their rooms were decorated; thence came the mantilla and the rebozo, in which the Jewish women veiled their charms from the public eye; thence, too, they had brought the courtly phrases—the perhaps somewhat inflated tone of their conversation, and many of the quaintly-compounded proper names, which had replaced, in a great measure, the old Hebrew appellations.

But the house of the Rabbi Elias was an exception to the general rule. He had, indeed, inherited from his father a considerable property; but he was unskilled in worldly matters, and, shortly after his father's death, lent out almost the whole of his fortune to one nobleman, though it was customary with his race to avoid any such imprudent venture as the setting of so large a stake upon a single cast. The result was peculiarly unfortunate for Elias; since his debtor, finding that the interest on his debt to the Jew was swallowing up the whole of his yearly revenues, made interest with the King to have the obligations which he had given to the Jew cancelled.

The chamber in which the Rabbi and his daughter were seated on the afternoon which I have selected for the commencement of this history was their study and library, if in such an age any room could lay claim to so dignified a title. Dear as manuscripts were in those days, the Rabbi had managed to retain many of these treasures, which he had purchased ere his fortune waned. Greek, Hebrew, Latin, and Arabic manuscripts were piled in confusion on the shelves and presses of the Rabbi Elias. There stood Aristotle and his Arabian commentators; there Plato, dear for his dreamy mysticism to the Oriental mind; there Seneca, in whom the Rabbi loved to trace glimmerings of the light which beamed so divinely in the Scriptures of his people; there Josephus, whom the Rabbi loved not, and declared to have been half a Pagan at heart; there the medical and astronomical treatises of the Cordovan sages; there, too, the theological puzzle of the Hebrew doctors, wherein the old priest would wander for day without a clue, pleased with his own entanglement, and for ever confident of finally discovering truth, by seeking her at the bottom of that deepest and darkest of wells whence the great Hebrew commentators had loved to drink.

Other volumes there were which, as Lord Bacon says, "would have come home to the business and bosoms of general readers" with far greater force than the works which I have specified. These were the Registers, in which the obligations of the Christians to the Jews were recorded. What suggestive volumes were they! and how many tales could they have told of lordly patrimonies bartered for the pleasures of a year; of noble families bankrupt in wealth and honour!

But the book which most engrossed the old Rabbi's time and attention, and that which lay open before him, as he now sat in his study, was a goodly folio, in which, in small, neat characters, he wrote, day by day, his great history of the Tribulations of Judah. Distressing as the events recorded in it must have been to every Jew (for it told of the sufferings of the exiled race from the destruction of Jerusalem down to the author's own time), it is not too much to say, that his happiest hours were spent in the composition of this elaborate work. The exultation of the author triumphed over the grief of the patriot; and, when he brought down his work to the period of the massacre at York, and had to record that his own parents were amongst its victims, he quite consoled himself for their untimely fate by handing it down to posterity in the most eloquent and sonorous terms at his command. Indeed, he was always most happy in his diction when he had the greatest atrocities to record; and "the most terrible truths" came "mended from his pen."

Muriel, who found these dreadful descriptions not much to her taste, was wont to chide him in her playful way, and to tell him that his history of the sufferings of his race would cause more misery to those who came after him than the cruelties described by him had inflicted on their forefathers. "I would rather have on my conscience," she would say, "the deaths of all those who died in the Castle of York, than the tears which thy description of the massacre will wring from millions yet unborn."

But the chronicler was so well pleased with the prospect of causing the "millions yet unborn to weep," that his daughter's ill-timed remonstrance only induced him to add a few more pathetic touches to the already harrowing recital.

I do not know why Muriel was more admired by her people than the other daughters of her race—for there were many more beautiful; unless it were that her beauty was of a kind not common with the women of her nation. She had, indeed, the full dark eye of her race, but not the olive complexion. She had the lofty brow, but not the raven hair peculiar to the Jewish maiden. Tasso might have said of her—

> That on her shoulders fell her yellow locks
> Like golden gleams on alabaster rocks.

Her nose was straight and gentle-looking, whilst those of her companions were as curved and as dangerous as scimitars; and her hand—but why should I dwell upon charms, which, after all, were the least of her attractions? How many pages of her father's cherished volume were devoted to her! How touchingly did he record that, when his wife had left him to bear alone the burden of his poverty, he took his little daughter from her Christian nurse, and wept over the babe for a season! How often in the history of after years did the words, "then the Rabbi Elias came home unto Muriel, and she said unto him words of comfort," follow close upon the recital of the indignities to which he, like every other Jew, was so frequently exposed! How often, when he wrote down his gloomy fears for the future of his people, and put on record his confident anticipations of their banishment from England, did he add, "therefore the Rabbi Elias trembled for Muriel even for the darling of his old age, and wished that God had not made her so tender and so beautiful!"

And, when I take in hand that old chronicle, the most precious of all the manuscripts I possess, I read the daughter's beauty by the light of the father's love, and she rises up before me, together with the old man whose later pages she inspired. I see the room with its ancient and well-worn furniture; the brass-bound books are plainer to me than my own library; the Rabbi's table is somewhat in shadow, and I cannot see his features quite distinctly, but I have a notion that he is writing one of his most laboured descriptions. I think that his cheek flushes, that his eye kindles, and that his breathing grows more rapid with the increasing speed of his pen. And Muriel sits nearer to the casement, and the sun, as it gleams through the lozenges of golden glass, falls on her fair face and golden hair, and there is such an aureole around her as the pictured angels are wont to have who sit near to St. Jerome, and minister to him as he writes.

It was a pity that any cloud should have come between the sun and her beauty; but that long, black, straggling, evil-looking cloud, which now darkened the little casement, and called itself Master Walter, the physician, was, of all others, that which her well-wishers would have been least pleased to see there. While Elias was alternately writing and reading his choicest passages to his daughter, they had been startled by a loud knocking at the outer door.

Master Elias, who was of a highly speculative turn of mind, had indulged in a variety of hypotheses as to the owner of the hand which was then hammering so lustily at the gate, and Muriel declared that the knock was not her cousin's knock, whereat her father was not a little astonished. Muriel only laughed: her Cousin Cressy, she said, knocked with a sharp quick stroke, as a man did who was sure of a welcome; whereas the present knock was long-drawn and hesitating, as if he who knocked were pausing to consider what he should do when the door was opened. As she spoke, something was heard to wriggle up the stairs, and the door opened to admit Master Walter, the physician.

It would have puzzled any body to decide whether he was most remarkable for his extreme height, or his conspicuous leanness. Either quality must singly have sufficed to make him the object of general attention wherever he went; but, when, combined in one man, and exaggerated to the eye by the long, shapeless, black tunic, which reached from his neck to his feet, they filled every beholder with a wonder, not unmingled with fear, lest a creature of such extreme tenuity should be snapped in twain by the wind. His shaven crown bespoke him in religious orders, and, indeed, there were at that time few, besides the clergy, who pretended to practise the art of healing.

It did not take the Rabbi and his daughter very long to note these peculiarities of their guest, for his visits at their house, which were always to one and the same intent, had of late been frequent. The medical knowledge of the Jews at that time was really considerable; but it gained so much by a comparison with the information possessed by Christian physicians, as to be held in a far higher estimation than it deserved. Master Walter, who, if he kept his patients in health at all, must have done it by his "magique naturel" (for other lore he had none), was filled with a burning desire to share in the wisdom which he believed the Jews to possess, and the very smallest modicum of which would be sufficient, as he well knew, to establish his fame and fortune; and Muriel was reputed to have a greater skill than even the far-famed Rebecca of York. He knew, too, that her reputation was not unfounded, for she had often ministered to the sick poor of the Christian community; and had done his best, then, to cultivate an acquaintance with her, in the hope that she might impart some of her secrets to him; but he had never, as yet, ventured to ask directly for any information. His character was well known both to the father and daughter, and so ill did they think of him, that they could scarcely bring themselves to treat him with the courtesy due to a guest.

"Might he know," the Rabbi asked, "why his poor dwelling was honoured by a visit from a Christian leech on a day which Christians usually employed in learning the extent of their obligations to Jews, and studying how best to requite them with ingratitude?"

Master Walter knew not well what to make of this speech, for his idea of an obligation to Jews was limited to certain chirographs, wherein he had acknowledged himself a debtor to sundry of the race, and he therefore concluded that the Rabbi was availing himself of the information which the registers afforded, to twit him with these little liabilities. "The worthy Episcopus," he said (for he never spared to employ titles as the cheapest possible means of propitiation)—"the worthy Episcopus was mistaken; he had had no leisure to think of his worldly affairs (much less to meditate the repudiation of his just debts, albeit the interest was most exorbitant), since he had been employed exclusively in ministering to the sick. He was, indeed in the habit of witnessing very painful scenes; he had at the present time a patient, even one stricken with the summer fever, whom it was sad to behold; and his motive for visiting them was to inform Muriel of the case. She had some knowledge of such matters, and would, doubtless, be interested to know that the fever had appeared so early in the season."

Muriel said she was already aware of its appearance. She had visited one stricken with the fever.

"The leech was astounded, delighted, grieved, all at once. He did not think there had been another case. He was glad that Muriel could compare notes with him. He was sorry that he had not gone with her to her patient, as he might have shown her how to bring him through. It would have been of service to her to see how a professed physician dealt with the sick.

The old Rabbi, who thought that his daughter knew more than the Angel of Healing, fell blindfold into the trap. "Did the leech think that he could teach Muriel to cure a fever, when she, by mercy giving a scruple of ——"

A slight cough from Muriel checked him, and he gulped down the names he was about to utter, to the infinite mortification of Master Walter.

"Master Walter was right," said Muriel, in her silvery tones; "she did wish to know somewhat of his art. She had often wished to inquire of his patients concerning him; but, somehow, they all died before she could get speech of them."

The leech strove hard to maintain his equanimity.

"Mistress Muriel was pleased to jest," he said, "for she well knew that all his patients did not die; there was Hobbe Lok, the sexton to St. Michael Paternoster Church, whom he had attended for the ague in the last fall. Hobbe Lok could now dig a grave with any man of his inches."

"Indeed!" Muriel said, "that must be a great happiness for Master Walter, who had occasion for so many graves. He could have better spared a better man than Hobbe Lok, no doubt."

The baffled physician bethought him of another course. "He had," said he, "concealed the real object of his visit from them out of deference to their feelings; but, since they did but jest with him, his duty to his patient compelled him to speak out. They did not know perhaps, that the King's Majesty had made him physician to his lately-erected house for converted Jews. Well, then, the patient he had spoken of lay sick in that house, else he had never come to them for advice.

The Rabbi Elias caught from the shelf the most ponderous of the registers, and, poising it in the air, displayed its formidable array of brazen bosses to the affrighted leech. "Talk not to me," shouted the old Jew, "of thy patients! Thinkest thou that the chief priest of his people will interfere to save the miserable bodies of those whose souls have already perished from before the face of their God? Away, wretch! and do thy work; for, know that I would smite, these even now, did I not know that thou art but the minister of the Destroying Angel who will employ thy ignorance to root out those wretched apostates from the earth."

Master Walter descended the stairs with an inconceivable rapidity; but, while he fumbled, in his fright, at the fastening of the door, Muriel laid her hand upon his shoulder, and said, as she put a packet into his hand. "I am not quite of my father's opinion, sir leech. He would have you poor outcasts die, that they sin no more; I would have them live, that they may repent of having sinned. That your patient may not want such opportunity, give him of the powder in this packet. You will find directions within, and may his gratitude at the escape from the great peril of thy ministrations help to turn him from the error of his ways."

"Beshrew me!" said the perplexed leech, as he walked hastily away "now am I in this dilemma, that I know not whether this accursed Jewess hath given me a healing drug, or some deadly poison, that she may be revenged on this imagin ary convert from her laws. I dare not administer it to any noble or wealthy citizen. Stay! I have it! the old ankeresse in the Smethefelde told me, but three days ago, that her son lay ill of this very fever, and prayed me to visit him. I cared not then to do as she asked, but I will go now, and try the drug on him; an he lives, I shall get great credit, for his mother is known to all in this city; and, an he dies, it will be the fault of Mistress Muriel alone!" and, so saying, the leech turned his steps towards the Smethefelde.

"Father," said Muriel, when she had returned to the indignant Rabbi, "I have to visit the sick mariner, of whom I spake to thee, and other sick persons, also, if it shall please thee to let me go." "Go! go! my daughter," said her father, "and let these Christians learn from thee what wisdom is in God's chosen people, even in this latter time of our trouble. As for me, I will write of 'the tribulations of Judah,' until the going down of the sun."

The Smethefelde was thronged, that afternoon, with groups of citizens, who had brought out their wives and children, to enjoy a walk through the pleasant pastures that skirted Turnmill Brook (see Engraving), Wherever the eye roved over those grassy meadows (wherein grazed the cattle of the canons of St. Bartholomew, of the Hospitallers, and of the nuns of Clerkenwell priory), it fell upon gay and varied dresses. The more old-fashioned of the citizenesses adhered to the green kirtle, which had been common since the Conquest; but there were many who aped the increasing extravagance of the nobility, and figured in tunics of blue or crimson. Perhaps, however, the cloth stockings of the ladies displayed the greatest variety of colour, and as the dress did not reach to the ancle, the spectators, who viewed the great parti-coloured multitude of feet from a distance, might have imagined the meadows to be enamelled with a vast variety of flowers. Dotted about amongst the gayer dresses of the wealthier citizens, might be seen the russet coats and peaked cowls of the mechanics, and the blaus (the progenitors of the modern smock frocks) of the agricultural labourers. Nor did the black vestments of the Dominicans, and the grey robes of the Franciscans—numbers of whom might be seen crossing the field in every direction—impair the effect of a picture, the otherwise excessive brilliancy of which they softened and relieved.

The characters of the assembled persons were as various as their dresses. Here swaggered Stephen Buckerel, the champion of the civic mob. Had he not led them forth, first to Isleworth, where they burnt the palace of the King's brother, and afterwards to the field of battle at Lewes, which, however, they quitted rather precipitately at the beginning of the fray, leaving De Montfort to fight and cover without them? Nevertheless Master Stephen swaggered and sang with a truculent jollity the ballad composed in honour of that memorable fight. Swagger and sing thy best, Master Stephen, for De Montfort's career is drawing to a close, and thou must soon select a different exercise for thy lungs. There, Master Simon Fitz-Mary and Master Ralph, of the Oyster-gate, discussed the recently-mooted proposition, that the Hustings Court should abandon its long-established usage, and sit in harvest time. Master Simon thought the project bad, and said, by his troth, that if the magnates of the City were hearing pleas in Court, they could not be gathering in their corn; and that it would be a pity either that they should neglect their duties for the sake of their crops, or lose their crops through their attention to their duties—of which two evils one must infallibly result from the adoption of the new plan. And, in good faith, when I consider the matter, I cannot think that Master Simon was far wrong."

And there were Master Arnold Thedmar, and his friend Gerard of Antioch, foreigners by birth, but naturalised citizens of London, conversing of the plea which the Abbot of Waltham had against the citizens for the stallage of their horses at Waltham fair; and there were many of De Montfort's party talking in a loud voice; and there were many of the King's friends whispering very quietly, whence you will argue justly that De Montfort's star was in the ascendant.

And, moreover, there was an innumerable company of women, whose conversation it were vain to describe, otherwise than by saying that it had neither beginning, middle, nor end, theme nor purpose, meaning nor use, and contained nothing worthy of opposition, or approbation, or of momentary attention, or of mature reflection, or indeed of any notice whatever. Still it was pleasant to hear them babble, just as it was pleasant to hear the birds sing; for though there was no more articulate meaning in the chat than in the song, a boundless cheerfulness, and a fulness of delight in that sweet season, and that balmy evening, had given birth to both. After all, too, your empty vessel always rings most musically.

Some way up Tusmill-brook, and at the spot now known as Cow-cross, stood the hermitage of Dame Katherine Hardel, the ankeresse. If, a month before the evening of which I am writing, any one had informed her — ex-Mayoress of London, saint in posse, and penitent in esse, of the Blessed Father Dominic of Vienne — that, on a given Sunday evening, a Jewess would be a welcome guest in her hermitage; she would have taken her rosary and banged it about the ears of that highly ridiculous prophet. But the good lady was a mother before she became an ankeresse. Her worthy husband, Master William Hardel, Mayor of London during that troubled year in which the barons fortified the city against King John, had spent his money so freely in his attempt to advance the people's cause, that on his retirement from the Mayoralty and a troubled world, he was only able to bequeath to his widow one son and 80 marks of silver. The good Katherine had employed half of the money in purchasing for her son a share in a vessel, which traded between London and Bordeaux, and on board of which he had lived ever since his father's death. By judiciously distributing the other half amongst the proper officers, she had obtained from the King the grant of forty feet of land in the Smethefelde, whereon some of the citizens, who had profited by her husband's hospitality, had built her a little hermitage. Her few wants were supplied by the charity of similar friends, and her life passed away quietly enough, its tranquillity being broken only by the visits which her son paid her whenever his ship was in the river. During his last visit to London he had contracted a dangerous fever, and it was he whom our friend, Master Walter, had originally declined to see, but was now preparing to visit. On the very day, however, on which he had refused to lend his valuable services, Muriel, passing near to the widow's cell, had seen her weeping bitterly at the door. The desire to relieve a sufferer followed, with Muriel, close upon the sight of one; and she immediately inquired of the ankeresse concerning the cause of her trouble. Dame Katherine, who at another moment would have spurned the Jewess from her door, knew not, at the time, whether she spoke to Jew or Christian.

Blinded by her tears, she sobbed out that her son was dying, and, upon being further questioned, said that he was lodged in a cottage on the manor of Blemundesmed, out beyond the head of the Holesbourne. My readers will readily understand that Muriel hastened to give him the drug about whose properties Master Walter was so anxious when we left him. Her efforts had been attended with complete success; and each succeeding visit which she paid to the cell of the ankeresse had carried an increased joy and hope to the heart of the mother. It was a dreadful shock to the ankeresse when she discovered that her benefactress was one whose name she dared not mention to the Blessed Father Dominic of Vienne. Happily that keeper of her conscience did not visit her for some days; for his occupation of begging friar necessarily made him rather a free liver, as his ministrations were generally paid in kind; and his laudable endeavours to eat all that was bestowed upon him had brought on a normal on his shin, which had confined him to his convent. And, somehow, during his absence, Muriel's name had found its way into the widow's prayers, which we will hope did her rather more good than if it had been told to the Blessed Father Dominic.

And thus it was that, when Master Walter had wriggled up to the hermitage with the design heretofore ascribed to him, he heard voices within, whereof one had a familiar sound. Then, by twisting his long neck and body judiciously, he managed to peep into the cell, and, to his surprise, discovered Muriel. From her conversation with the ankeresse, he managed to learn, not only why she was there, but that she had cured the sick mariner with the drug, of which he had a portion in his pouch; and, as this was all he cared to know, he glided away again as noiselessly as a long, lean, black, and venomous snake.

And now, as Muriel comes out of the cell, and will not let the ankeresse accompany her, because the evening air is cold, who is it that steps from behind the cell and draws near to her side? Is it another victim of the prevailing fever? I should not guess his malady from his looks, certainly; for his walk is rapid and easy, his cheek is flushed, and his eye is bright with health. But there is a fever in his veins, too, and his pulse beats faster than healthy pulses do, as he takes her little hand in his; and the words "Cressy!" "Muriel!" "Dearest wife!" "My own husband!" are murmured in low, thrilling whispers.

The old ankeresse has laid down upon her pallet; the citizens and their wives have gotten them home to their evening meal; the rooks have all settled down in their nests on the tall trees that encircle the Priory of St. Bartholomew; and the moon, shining into a casement in Coleman-street, silvers over the hair and beard of the old Rabbi, yet Muriel is still abroad visiting the sick.

Worthy and philosophical, but happy, credulous Elias. I will take to me thy cherished manuscript, and search for the paragraph which thou didst indite on that calm summer evening, by the light of the bright moon, and of thy glimmering wisdom:—

"And it came to pass, when the Gentile leech had departed, with death and desolation attending upon him, that the daughter of the Rabbi Elias went out [illegible] And lo! she came along; so that the Rabbi and Vessy the [illegible] must have increased in this city; and besought God that he might do right and take no harm. And behold! when she came in, her eyes were red, and weeping. And her father questioned her not; for he knew [illegible] seen much [illegible] ness, [illegible] reckoning of [illegible] [illegible] her soul. And he kissed her on the cheek, and [illegible] the God of the fathers be upon [illegible] [illegible] And she left him, and went into her chamber, weeping as she went."

CHAPTER II.

THY young Cressy, whose maladies, as we have seen, detained Muriel so long from her home, and caused her so much anxiety, was the son of her father's brother Hagen—the richest, and the least popular of his race, but a special favourite with the Royal family.

Elias had long separated himself entirely from the company of his brother, whom he regarded as a traitor to the cause of their nation. Had he not employed his influence with the King to obtain a grant of the houses and effects of Benedict, of Milk-street, when that choleric Hebrew, having slain a Christian, "quodam anelacio," as the chronicle says, "in vico de Colecherche," was forced to fly beyond the seas? Had not Hagen withheld from the distressed family of Benedict even the smallest portion of the confiscated property, though he could well have afforded to endow them with the whole of it? Further, had not this same Hagen declined to interfere when the King's cheap generosity to the Earl Warenne had made Elias poor? Nay, it was even rumoured that he had taken money of the Christian noble, and consented, for that base consideration, to look on silently while they despoiled his brother. Nor did Hagen entertain a much more favourable opinion of his brother, though his dislike was based on different grounds. He thought him a mere dreamer—a purblind dotard—who loved better to chronicle the cruelties inflicted by the Christians on his race, than to avenge himself by spoiling the Egyptians in the way of business. Above all, he deemed him poor; and, as all these opinions were warranted by fact, and as the Rabbi would have taken no pains to refute them in any case, the two brothers, whose houses were separated only by a street, and who met almost every day, always passed each other, without any attempt on either side to put an end to their estrangement. Cressy, however, did not share his father's dislike of Elias; but then his father did not know Muriel; and it must be clear to all, that the young man's knowledge of the daughter would give him a great insight into her father's character. How should we know a tree, except by its fruits? And, in Cressy's estimation, the tree which had produced so fair a blossom as Muriel must be sound and good from its root to its topmost twig.

Elias, as we have seen ere this, thought Cressy a good listener, and an excellent judge of composition. His credit only have inferred his ability to act in the latter from his frequent appearance in the former capacity; for the young man seldom offered any critical commentary on his uncle's writings; but his power of concentrating his attention was something marvellous. It must have been an hereditary quality, I think, for Muriel possessed it in an equal degree; and they would sit through the whole evening, while the old man read aloud, without ever so much as interrupting him by a sound. Nay, so wrapt were they, that, lest they should fall into a trance akin to that which an Indian yogi induces, by close meditation, they were forced to clasp each other's hands very tightly, and thus bind themselves down to the world, above which the Rabbi's somewhat inflated paragraphs would otherwise have carried them. We have heard them address each other as husband and wife; but of this relationship neither Hagen nor Elias had the smallest possible suspicion. Hagen had other views for his son, and would have opposed their union with his whole influence; and Elias, though very well disposed towards Cressy, was too poor to pay the fine which the King invariably exacted of every Jew or Jewess before he granted him or her license to marry. These fines were always considerable; and a man in the station of our Rabbi would have been called upon to pay at least a thousand marks.

When, therefore, during one of those periodical journeys throughout the land, which "our trusty and well-beloved Elias, Bishop of all the Jews of England," was wont to make, his daughter and nephew solemnly betrothed themselves before the deputy, whom he was empowered by Royal authority to leave in his place. They did not think it necessary to inform him of a fact, the knowledge of which might some day be imputed to him as a fault; and, as the deputy died before the return of his principal, he had no opportunity of informing him how very satisfactorily he had filled his place. Married the lovers were not yet; but their betrothal deprived them of the power of marrying any one else; and they were so happy in having thus attained to what may be called the negative advantage of matrimony, that they were content to postpone the fruition of positive happiness until better days should come.

It was on her way to meet Cressy by Turnmill-brook that Muriel had paused to ask the cause of Dame Katherine's grief; and, though the good ankeresse was then prevented by her tears from seeing the handsome young man who was lounging about near her cell, she caught so many glimpses of him during Muriel's subsequent visits to her, that she began to suspect there must be a relation of cause and effect subsisting between two such good-looking apparitions. And when, by dint of sly and pertinacious inquiry she had succeeded in eliciting the whole truth, she was so delighted at finding that the Jews were, after all, so very like to Christians, that the Blessed Dominic of Vienne had no farther chance of ousting Muriel from her affections. "Why, Cressy and Muriel had done what her boy Randolf and Mistress Maude of the Oyster-gate, the pretty daughter of old Ralph of that ilk, would fain do if they had not the fear of Mistress Maude's father before their eyes. Yea, and she had had lovers too; though she asked pardon of St. Werburgh, and St. Botolph, and St. Etheldurga, and St. Thomas of Acons, for remembering that she had ever been aught but a grey gown full of dried skin and bones. And she would warrant, now, that would she, that Muriel had some love-token about her; such, for instance, as her own gold crucifix, which her husband (and it was no sin to remember one's husband, though many widows acted as if it were) gave her at their troth-plighting, and which she always wore under her robe, and fastened to her neck by the very lace which her husband had tied upon it."

So, though she could not allow any man but her confessor to come within her hermitage, she was pleased enough that Muriel should meet her lover near it; and it therefore became their usual trysting-place.

Master Walter, who had used the contents of Muriel's packet in many cases of fever during the two months which we must suppose to have elapsed since she gave it to him, had found its healing powers to exceed even his warmest anticipations, and was, consequently, more than ever anxious to become acquainted with the name and nature of the drug. He had made several attempts to glean this information from Muriel and her father, but his efforts had uniformly failed. The fever was increasing in the City, his packet was quite exhausted, and his natural desire for money was considerably heightened by the pressure of debts contracted at an exorbitant rate of interest; for Master Walter had his secret pleasures, and had long been in the habit of spending a great deal more than he earned. In this dilemma he bethought him that Muriel had healed the widow's son with the identical drug, a knowledge of which he coveted so anxiously. She might have, perhaps, imparted its name to her patient or his mother; and, ful. of this not very rational idea, he determined to visit the ankeresse, and elicit from her, by well-put questions, all that she knew.

It was a fine warm morning, as he walked across the meadow that lay between the Hospital of Rahere and Dame Hardel's hermitage. The ankeresse was not, according to custom, at the door of her cell; and, when the leech called her by name, he received no answer. He entered the cell; but its inmate was no longer in a condition to repel his intrusion with the indignation which the entry of a man into that virtuous retreat would at another time have excited. The poor ankeresse had been stricken by paralysis that morning, and lay on her pallet cold in death. He approached the couch, and, carelessly lifting the loose robe of grey serge in which the shrunken form of the ankeresse was enveloped, was attracted by the glitter of gold. It was the long-treasured crucifix.

He looked for a knife; but could find nothing, whether blunt or sharp. In sheer despair—for he heard the sound of approaching footsteps—he took the lace in both hands and broke it off close to the neck of the corpse. Then, hastily thrusting the crucifix into the bosom of his dress, he strode from the hermitage; but had not gone ten yards from the door, when Muriel passed him on her way thither. The leech paused for a moment, as if he would speak; but suddenly changed his mind, and resumed his rapid progress towards the town; and, a few minutes afterwards, might have been seen talking with the sokenreeve of St. Bartholomew's Priory, who was holding a plough awhile that morning, to see if he could drive as straight a furrow as he had been wont in his youth.

Muriel entered the cell, and was much shocked to find that the friend to whom she had gradually become so much attached had passed away without a parting word. The bareness of the cell was not lost upon her; and when, on introducing her hand within the robe of the ankeresse, to try if the heart had quite ceased to beat, she found that the crucifix was gone, and that the lace by which it hung had been broken, she at once concluded that the leech had been busy with the property of the dead. But, while she meditated rather sorrowfully on this, a rough hand was laid on her shoulder; and, in another moment, she was dragged out of the cell by the sokenreeve of St. Bartholomew, who had stolen upon her unobserved.

"Hailoa! my mates all," cried he to some agricultural labourers, who were passing, "this accursed Jewess hath done to death the good old ankeresse here! A rope and a stone for her, say I, and let us sink her in Turnmill-brook. I warrant me, St. Bartholomew will send us water enough to drown so foul a murderess, though it be the shallow season now."

The men came at his call; and Muriel, struggling vainly in their grasp, was dragged onwards towards the brook; but, at that crisis, Cressy and another young man, who had approached from opposite directions, rushed up to her aid. Cressy caught her in his arms, and dealt two or three such blows at those who had been holding her as made them glad to leave her; whilst the other, running full butt against the sokenreeve, tumbled him into the brook for which he had destined Muriel.

Cressy spoke not at all; but the other, after lending a hand to pull the sokenreeve out of the water, exclaimed, "Why! how now, my masters, would you drown the best leech in Christendom? I will be sworn that none of you have suffered from the fever, of which she cured me, or you would know better than to take the life of one who can cure it."

"Nay! but, Master Randolph," said the sokenreeve, who was somewhat cooled by his bath, "this Jewess has slain your mother, who lies dead in yonder cell."

The young man staggered back, and rushed into the cell. He returned after a time, with a grave pale face, and said, "My poor mother is, indeed, dead; but I will be sworn that my good physician had no hand in her death, and you shall lay no hand upon her while I stand by."

"But, my masters," said a short, fat, man, who had joined the group, "methinks this is not a question to be decided on in an instant, in the open field. Shall not the Sheriff's know of this? Ay, marry! and that shall they, seeing that I am one of them. Wherefore, I cite all parties to my court, in Cornhill."

As the captors of Muriel moved off with her, in obedience to the Sheriff's orders, the widow's son muttered, "Ay! go thy way, Master Ralph of the Oyster-gate, for a big-speaking man as thou art. But I will go down into the City, where, it may be, I shall find some one who will have wit enough to make thee give a just decision in this matter."

Sheriff Ralph, of the Oyster-gate, was indeed a big-speaking man. Probably such big words never before or since proceeded from so little a body, for he was not over five feet in height; and then he spoke with a volume of sound that would have suited a Colbrand or Ascapard, and with the fire and energy of a Lancelot or a Gawaine. It was a grand treat, I promise you, for the citizens when he made an oration. He raised himself on his toes, and half-closed his eyes, as a cock does in the act of crowing; and his little flaxen curls danced about his ears with the violence of his gestures; and his flexible nose curled up, and up, and up, as though it, too, were fascinated by his words, and wished to soar after them.

But Master Ralph, though such a son of thunder on the hustings, was tame enough in his own parlour. Pretty Mistress Maude, the loud-spoken Sheriff's daughter, not only knew him to be only a little fat man, but remembered that her mother, who had been dead some years, regarded him much in the same light, and took no more head of his powerful speech than of the kitten's mew. So Mistress Maude kept a tight hand upon him, and daily laboured to bring him into such a docile frame of mind as should permit her to communicate to him her fixed intention of marrying young Randolph Hardel. Therefore, when Randolph came to tell her that the good Jewess who had saved him from the fever was in peril of her father's court, she called for her wimple without delay, and set off for Cornhill, where, hard by our Pope's-Head-alley, the Sheriff's held their court.

The Sheriff and his prisoner had already arrived; and, as the rumour that the old ankeresse had been murdered by a Jewess had spread through the City, a vast crowd had collected to learn the result of her examination by the Sheriff. Maude, however, contrived to get into court by a side door, which led her into a part of the room that was screened from the rest by a crimson curtain. The Sheriff's chair was placed in front of this curtain, the use of which was to conceal any powerful persons who might possess an influence with the Court, and might wish to exercise it in secret. There was a chair placed behind it, close to that of the Sheriff; and in this chair Maude placed herself to bide her time. When she arrived, all the evidence against Muriel, which was limited to the fact of her being found by the dead body of the ankeresse, had been laid before the Court, and the Sheriff had called upon her for her defence. Meanwhile, Muriel, casting her eyes round the court, had perceived the long body of the leech, who had come to witness, as he thought, her condemnation. In his struggle through the crowd the bosom of his gown had been somewhat disarranged, and a piece of blue lace, which was apparently attached to something within the gown, was hanging on his breast. Muriel formed her plan in an instant.

"I have to say, most excellent Sheriff," began she, in low clear tones, that went to the heart of the listener behind the curtain, "I have to say that not only am I innocent of this imputed murder, but that, as I believe, no murder has been committed. I went to visit the ankeresse, as was my wont, for I had rendered some service to her son, and she loved me therefore. I found her dead, as Master Walter, the leech, can testify, for he had been there before me, and I charge him, by that which he has in his bosom (if, indeed, he esteems it to be a holy relic) to say that I am innocent of all blame."

Master Walter was taken in a snare. He was not quick at shifts; and here the time allowed him to find one was so short that he might well be at a loss; so, in his fear that Muriel would expose his conduct, he admitted, with the worst possible grace, that he had quitted the cell shortly before Muriel entered it, that the ankeresse was dead.

"THE IVORY CARVER."—PAINTED BY E. H. WEHNERT.

THE ADDITIONAL TURNERS.

We were not without some apprehension that the cream of the Turner collection had been presented in the first set. We are happy to find, however, more than one truly capital work in this second contribution to the Marlborough House Gallery. If every succeeding quota has such sterling metal we will not be severe in dealing with the unavoidable alloy. In fact, we are almost happy, on artistic grounds, that there is not only great variety of subject, but great inequality of value. Even in the slightest and most sketchy performances we have the easy, playful vein, or slightly-expressed intention, of a vigorous potentiality.

The "Goddess of Discord in the Garden of the Hesperides" (1806). This is in his early manner; but does not remind one of Wilson, but of a compound of Salvator's Calabrian rocks and Dughet's Vales of Romagna; in short, one of the most superb combinations of Nature mirrored in schools of Art that imagination can conceive. This picture is full of grand invention; we are sensible of a feeling of sublimity in these beetling cliffs and thundercloud; while below we have the placid vale, with its chequered lights and umbrageous recesses. The figures, too, are excellent—far beyond the usual Turner. In his later pictures real men and women are as if wraiths of Children of the Mist; but here the Immortals are given with all the beauty and grace of the tangible flesh and blood of those delicious southern regions which furnished models for the chisel of a Phidias, and the pencil of a Nicholas Poussin. We need not trouble our readers with the classic legend. In none of the pictures of Turner is the story told with more distinctness. A dragon is a piece of machinery that either tells with great effect or provokes ridicule. Here this daring feat is successful. We do not deride, but curiously examine, the vaguely-defined monster, guardian of the fruit, who was destined in the sequel to be destroyed by Hércules; and we admit that one of the most difficult feats of painting has been accomplished. This work stands at the threshold of Turner's so-called classical style. Up to this time he had been almost exclusively a literal but magnificently vigorous transcriber of the scenes of home, the sunny vale of the Thames, the breezy downs of Surrey and Sussex, the bright-glistening seaboard of the summer holidays, or the drenchy days of the Channel during the squalls of March or the gloom of November. No longer tied down by the effort to surmount technicality, he now ventures a bolder flight to the airy regions of fancy. Future ages and distant nations will not easily forget to note how high he flew and how long he continued on the wing! We understand that this picture is here engraved for the first time.

"Regulus Leaving Rome" (1837) bears also strong proofs of the idiosyncrasy of the fully-matured Turner. But it is not a feeble picture. If we have not the mastery of the impossible, we see the daring effort of genial conception and technical power to approach its limits. The picture is small, in superficies, but the subject is great and treated greatly; the figures are too small to be taken in detail, but the very name, "Regulus Leaving Rome," calls up a host of associations. The architecture is very striking. It is Martin's Assyrian and Egyptian masses Romanised for the occasion. The result in the hands of Turner has that effect which the reader may guess. The execution is interesting to the curious in painting. How astonishingly the flags of the ships are meters of the density of the fog between them and the buildings beyond!

"Ulysses Deriding Polyphemus" (1829). This is one of the grandest efforts of the master—the subject being taken from that immortal voyage which is the Patriarch of all Romaunt. A narrowly-understood Christianity leads us to look down with contempt on the mythology of the Greeks. Not so the sympathetic imagination of a more catholic Christianity, which can without effort look upwards to the religious sentiment and religious forms of the Greeks from the lower plane of darker ages, cruder intelligence, and the more ungraceful mythology of Baal and Osiris.

Ruddy sky, such as we never saw in any other picture, is graduated with faultless expansion through magnificent floating clouds of gold in one part of the picture, which harmoniously contrasts with cool, grey-tinted masses of supernatural shadow at the other extremity. A magnificence of invention and conception strikes at once upon the spectator. Great as the execution is we feel that form and colour have limits which do not express but rather shackle the soul of the poet-painter. This picture is more than Claude in execution, and almost more than Milton in that power which lies in a vague impression of preternatural sublimity.

"THE IVORY CARVER."

PAINTED BY E. H. WEHNERT.

CHARLES BOKER, an American poet of some reputation, has furnished the subject of the picture by Mr. Wehnert which is faithfully represented in the above Engraving. The "Ivory Carver" is the name of the poem from which the incident is taken. The Carver, inspired by that devotional feeling which is known to have possessed many of those who have engaged upon works of a religious character, has abandoned himself entirely to the production of an ivory Christ, and in the accomplishment of this pious labour has well-nigh [illegible] dren to perish from want. The bereaved husband and parent at last overcome the enthusiast, and he gives utterance to impious upbraidings upon the death of his children. After a time three stars descend from heaven, and thus the poet:

> Ah me! 'twas a mournful sight to see
> The three stars shining sorrowfully,
> On the raging breast of him who poured
> His puny wrath at our gracious Lord.
> Awhile, with stubborn and wilful might,
> The artist strove to drive from his sight
> The kindly look of the starry trine;
> Yet true as he might, some power divine
> Would soften his will—he knew not why—
> And draw to the light his troubled eye.
> Long, long he looked; till his heavy grief
> Of heart gushed forth, and a full relief
> Of balmy tear-drops fell, round on round
> Like the blood which marks yet heals a wound.
> He staggered, he bowed his stubborn knee,
> He fixed his eyes on the shining three;
> And the tears so magnified his gaze,
> That the face of heaven seemed all ablaze
> With light and mercy. He knew the stars
> That looked through his earthly dungeon-bars—
> "I see, he shouted, "ye live, ye live
> Death is a phantom! O God, forgive!"

when he found her, and that he had no doubt whatever that her death had arisen from natural causes. As the widow's son professed his entire concurrence in the latter opinion, and confirme it, in a measure, by stating that his mother had been ill for some days, and bore a willing testimony to the [illegible] Mr. Mayhew's assertion, the coroner would have declined that her remains must undergo the [illegible] but Master Ralph of the Oyster-gate was one to brave a case in a mortar. "He was by no means of opinion," he said, "that Muriel was to be hoodwinked in that sort by no one. Even a woman's hand came out from behind the curtain, and [illegible] Lyon, fairly pulled his head inside. A smothered conversation ensued between himself and some person inside the curtain, whereof those in the body of the court heard no more than "Nay, but, good Master!" and "I tell thee, Father," at times, mostly imploring and peremptory. At length the head of the Sheriff reappeared in court, and, with a stride of apparent unconcern, he took up the broken thread of his discourse again.

"An attempt had been made," he said, "to influence the Court; but it had failed of its effect (here the crimson curtain shook vehemently, as if something very like a laugh was being [illegible] from behind it); he (the Sheriff) advocate as he had intended, thought out (and from that decision an army should not draw him), that the most Muriel could be mulcted of on board, and recorded upon the Lord Mayor's and her father's note of three days. And, if any one present had a question that verdict, he should be put in mercy of the Court."

Having delivered himself of this decision, he finally disappeared behind the curtain.

Cressy and Randolph would have had some difficulty in escorting Muriel through the crowd, but the court-house, as we have seen, had two exits, was of one opening into Cornhill, and the other into Lothbury-street, and Master Randolph, being one of the latter, at the last named exit, which was comparatively deserted, and, having ascertained that the prisoner would not be [illegible] to [illegible] therefore, as the court was cleared, and the [illegible] had taken part in the trial came out into Cornhill, the [illegible] of the populace, both at the [illegible] at the [illegible] of Muriel, was very great. "To the devil with this Sheriff!" cried the sokenreeve. "To the devil with him, I say! If this Jews-call not murder the ankeress, who shall say what evil practices she meant to put upon the poor dumb body? We have heard of Jewesses who fed on Christians." A hoarse roar of approval, told that he had touched the hearts of the crowd. "They crucified a child at York!" shouted one. "And another at Winchester!" cried a second. "And three at Bury!" bellowed a third. "They clip the coin, and defraud the poor labourers thereby!" said Americ of Pavia, the moneychanger. "They take interest at 65 per cent!" added Renaud of Cahors, who never took less than 50 per cent. "They own the best houses in London, and pay no tithes thereon!" cried the priest of St. Martin, in Ironmonger-lane. "They know great secrets in medicine and will not impart them to Christians!" put in Master Walter, the physician. "They are richer than the nobles, and will soon be masters of the kingdom!" was the cry of a thousand voices. "And," shouted the burly Stephen Buckerel, "they are the enemies of our good friend and friend, Simon de Montfort. To your [illegible] and cows, good citizens, and let us smoke these bloodsuckers from their nest." "Away! away!" shouted the mob, "let us away! to our weapons, and then to the Jewry!" And in a few minutes Cornhill was deserted.

The events which I have described had occupied so much time that the evening was closing in, ere Cressy and Muriel arrived at the house of the latter. The Rabbi had been terribly alarmed by the absence of his child, and the explanations which she gave of it distressed him still more. It was nearly dark before she had succeeded in calming him, and Cressy was beginning reluctantly to talk of leaving them, when a neighbour, Benoni, of Bread-street, came in and said, "Honourable Rabbi, our people will need your counsel and presence. There is much stir in the City, and large bodies of armed citizens are in the streets. There is talk, I hear, of an attack on our quarter; and thou knowest that in these unsettled times, those who are opposed to the King, hate us as his instruments. I fear me, we shall be sore bested to-night."

"I will go forth," said the Rabbi, "I will speak with this wild people. Peradventure, they will hear the words of the sage."

"Oh! my father," cried Muriel, "they will but dishonour thy grey hairs. Thou knowest not what hideous scenes occurred at one to-day as I was led through the streets. The very women had lost the semblance of their sex, and spat on me as I passed. But hark!"

Even while she spoke there came up in the wind a roar like that of a stormy sea, and in another instant their street, usually so quiet, was alive with their people, who hastily rewarded either side of it, shouting as they went, "To the chains! to the chains!" The Jews, trained to expect repeated outrages from the violence of the Christian citizens, had provided the end of every street in their quarter which debouched on the districts inhabited by Christians, with a strong barrier of posts and chains, which might be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

CITIZENS OF LONDON WALKING IN THE PLEASANT PASTURES OF SMETHFIELDE.

For the present, however, we will go in and have some talk with the Prior."

When Muriel heard Master Walter's last speech, she divined his intention as readily as if he had uttered his thoughts aloud. "It is clear," thought she, "that he means to visit me between this and to-morrow to try if he can win my knowledge from me. O, Cressy! if I might but carry these away with me, far from these bad men! Ha! Do I not see a way to manage that? Heaven give me wit to work out my purpose; for I am sore bested, and the wicked compass me round about."

She walked rapidly towards her home. Her look was more thoughtful, but less sorrowful, than when she had set out in the morning; and her whole manner was that of one who had escaped from the torment of doubt, and was steadfastly bent upon the development of a settled plan. Her father had, as he thought, news for her that would grieve her much; for, during her absence, he had received an order from the King to quit England within three days. But Muriel expressed neither surprise nor grief; she did her best to cheer her father; and when the poor old Rabbi recorded in his book that the King had been pleased to banish him, he added the following comment on that melancholy text:—"And the Rabbi Elias was sorely grieved, for he had hoped to lay his bones by the side of Belasez, the daughter of Aaron, whom he had to wife, and who lay buried in the cemetery of the Jews, which was without the city of London, and near unto the gate called Cripplegate; but Muriel, his daughter, rejoiced, for that she he[illegible] many cities, and the manners of strange countries; and for that it is the nature of the young to seek after change; but, of the old, to love quiet, and to abide near the home of their youth."

While he was delivering himself of these profound thoughts Muriel sought her uncle, who received her with a well-feigned appearance of regret for her approaching separation from him. Muriel thanked him for his kindness, and assured him that it only made her regret the more a misfortune which, to her certain knowledge, was about to fall upon him. The old man was terribly alarmed. At another time Muriel would have amused herself with his fears, but moments were too precious now, so she told him without further parley how she had heard Master Walter, the physician, say that the King had promised to cancel his debt to her uncle. Hagen was furious at this intelligence. He tore his hair, and stamped about the room so madly, that Muriel began to fear she should never be able to compose him. At last an idea occurred to him—"Had she informed any one else of what she had heard? She had not. Good! Then his course was plain. He would take Master Walter's chirographs (or, rather, the inferior portions of them) out of the public chest and sell them. Thus, when they were cancelled, the loss would fall on the buyer of them only. His good Muriel could assist him in this scheme. She could sell them for him, for as she was to leave England in four days, no ill consequences could accrue to her from the act."

But Muriel now held back. "She knew not why she should risk her fame for him, who had never given her anything. Nay—people said that he had helped to bring about the banishment of her father and herself! No; she had warned him, but she would not help him!"

Her well-feigned reluctance drew on her uncle. He made offers; which she rejected in turn, as inadequate to the service for which they were to be given, and, in short, managed him so well, that within an hour of her return home Master Walter's two chirographs were in her hands; and her uncle had promised that, could she sell them, she should have one-half of their value, which, as I before said, was two thousand marks. These preliminaries arranged, she betook herself to the quarter of the house inhabited by her father and herself; and there confidently awaited the visit of Master Walter, the physician.

He was not long in making his appearance, and Muriel noted, with secret delight, the anxiety under which he laboured, and of which she so well knew the cause. To bring him the more quickly to the point, she commented upon his evident perturbation, and expressed a hope that he was not in trouble or ill health. Charmed to find her so affable, the leech replied, "that she herself was the cause of his embarrassment—that he had heard of her approaching banishment, and that he was filled with grief at the idea of losing so able a coadjutor. It was not to be expected that he could cure all the sick of the city, by his unassisted skill; and now Muriel was going there would be no one to help him. Still, if she trusted him with her prescriptions, she might rest assured that it would be the better for the poor among her own people."

"Ah! Muriel did not dare to listen to him. If her people knew that she had imparted any such secrets to him they would never forgive her. Yet she would have wished to oblige him, as she had occasion for money, and her time was short. She held two chirographs for a thousand marks each, and she wished to sell them. Could not Master Walter advance her the money on them?"

"Would she share that medical knowledge with him, if he procured the money for her chirographs?"

"Yes, if by that afternoon he brought her two thousand marks for her chirographs—she would give him some advice, by following which he would become the happiest and richest man in England. But he must be cautious not to let her people get wind of the affair, or they would kill her."

So Master Walter, taking the chirographs with him, set off to raise the money upon them. Of course, he betook himself to his friend the Caorsin. But he had great difficulty in inducing that worthy to advance the money until Walter confessed that the King had promised to grant him the messuage in the Jewry formerly in the possession of the Rabbi Elias and that the grant was to be made as soon as the old priest had left the country. He would assign that messuage to the man who should advance him two thousand marks on the chirographs in question." The scruples of the Caorsin vanished when Master Walter made a formal assignment of the promised messuage; and, before nightfall, Muriel had received the two thousand marks, one half of which she handed over to her uncle.

Meanwhile Muriel had placed her thousand marks in Cressy's hands. She would not tell him whence she had obtained it, for, said she, "He shall never have to reproach himself with having cheated his father." "Go, Cressy," said she, "purchase for thyself the papers which thou wilt require to pass the ports unquestioned; and then seek out Randolph Hardel, in whose ship a passage is taken for my father and myself. Tell him how the case stands with us, and ask him, for the love he bears to his Maude, to carry thee with us; and be sure to tell him that those who are betrothed are, by our people, held to be united for ever, and then he will not think me so bold in wishing to take thee with me; and, for the next two days, my Cressy, let us not be seen together, lest thy father suspect our plans; but, when they are past, we will part no more for ever."

Cressy would fain have known whence she obtained the money; but she made answer that it was her own, and that there was no time to talk of it then; so the young man set off to carry out her plans.

On the third morning after the day on which Muriel had transacted so much business, and before the sun had well risen, a little knot of persons was assembled at the Oyster-gate, in Thames-street. It was composed of Elias, Muriel, Randolph Hardel, pretty Mistress Maude, and our good friend Master Walter. He had kept a sharp eye upon Muriel's movements during the preceding days, but had seen nothing in her conduct to excite suspicion. He had now, as he said to himself, just looked down to say farewell to his old friends; and the honest Rabbi, albeit he disliked the man, could not help being touched by an attention which none of his own people had shown him. "Verily," said the Rabbi, to himself, "verily, I may say 'there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.' This Christian has come out of his bed to take a last look at the old Rabbi, whilst Hagen, the son of my mother, has, if men do not belie him, worked hard to rid the kingdom of me."

"Here comes our boat," said Randolph Hardel, as the Rabbi's thoughts took this uncomfortable turn. "Here comes the boat, and she will soon carry us to the Bonny Maude, which lies below bridge. Bless thee, Maude, my maiden. Let me buss thee; once—twice—there, and three times too! There are none here to blab of it. And now, bid thee back to thy bed, before thy father, the good Sheriff, wake, and wants his morning draught. Now, venerable Rabbi, mind where thou art going, or thou will plump to the bottom instead of into the boat, and we have small time to fish thee up again. And thou, too, Mistress Muriel, leave talking with the potticar, and let my mate here help thee into the boat."

Muriel put a sealed paper into Master Walter's hand. "If thou dost follow the directions herein contained," said she, "there will be none in this town whom thou needest envy. Farewell!"

She stepped into the boat, and the sturdy arms of the rowers rapidly swept it below the bridge.

In a minute Master Walter was joined by the Caorsin: "Let us see," said the latter, "what this Jewess hath bequeathed to thee. Nay! no shrinking, man. Hast thou forgotten our compact." And, snatching it from Master Walter's unwilling hand, he opened it. It was covered over with closely-written characters; and the heart of the leech beat quickly, for he thought that Muriel had left him all her receipts. The Caorsin read a few lines, and then dashed the paper on the ground. "Fooled! fooled!" he cried; and would have trampled it under his feet; but the leech, with trembling hands, picked it up, and read:—

"Master Walter,—I entreat your attention to the following sentences. Whoso treasures them in his inmost soul, and makes them the rule of his daily life, will have what is better than fine gold—namely, a clear conscience and a contented mind:—

"'Be not wise in thine own eyes. Fear God and depart from evil. It shall be health to thy body and marrow to thy bones.'

"'Wealth gotten by vanity shall be diminished; but he that getteth it by labour shall increase.'

"'The getting of treasure by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro of them that seek death.'

"'Happy is the man that getteth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is greater than the merchandise of silver and the gain thereof than fine gold.'"

Master Walter could read no more. He flung the paper wildly in the air, and would have rushed from the spot; but the Caorsin caught him by the throat (see Engraving). "Miserable quacksalver!" cried he; "whose were the chirographs on which I lent these two thousands marks?"

The leech could not reply, for his companion's question filled him with a horrid foreboding. Need I say that his fears were well founded; and that, when this precious pair compared the numbers on the chirographs with the corresponding numbers in the Register, they found that Master Walter had pledged once more the chirographs which the King had promised to cancel, and had plunged himself still further into such a labyrinth of debt as nothing short of absolute repudiation could free him from?

Nevertheless, if to be remembered in the prayers of a good man could avail Master Walter in anything, that privilege was his, for Muriel never imparted to her father the reasons which had prompted the leech to accompany them to the shore; and, in after years when (in their comfortable house in the good city of Toledo, where Cressy had found employment with a Jewish merchant) the old Rabbi offered up prayers for his darling Muriel and for Cressy, whom he now loved for Muriel's sake, and for the grand-children whom Muriel had taught to love and honour him, the simple-minded old man would often recur to the Christian who had displayed so strange an interest in them; would read the amused Muriel a long lecture upon the impropriety of forming hasty dislikes on too slight grounds, and point his moral with a fervent prayer that fortune would wait on the efforts of one in whose character he himself had been greatly mistaken; but whom he was now proud to call his "good friend, Master Walter, the physician."

NOTE.—I think it right to inform the readers of the foregoing tale that I have been guilty of altering the date of one of its principal events. The attack on the Jewry took place in the year preceding, and not in the same year with the Battle of Evesham.

THE SPEECH AND THE ADDRESS.

THE Royal Speech at the opening of the Session is principally occupied, as might have been foreseen, with the questions of our European and Asiatic policy. The domestic subjects introduced are few and unimportant; and include no reference to Parliamentary Reform, or to the Education of the People, from which significant omissions the public may perhaps be justified in coming to the conclusion that the Government will leave these matters to the action of independent members, and either support or oppose them, as Ministerial judgment, or the necessities of party, may dictate. In addition to the old, the perpetually-recurring, and never-to-be-avoided question of the Estimates for the year, the only topics of domestic interest which are mentioned are the renewal of the Bank Charter Act, the state of the law relating to Joint-Stock Banks generally, and the Consolidation and Amendment of some important portions of the Law. The Lord Chancellor, prior to the debate on the Address, gave notice of his intention to introduce three Bills for the Reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts, under the several divisions of marriage and divorce, wills, and general jurisdiction; and in the Lower House the Home Secretary obtained leave to bring in a Bill with reference to transportation and secondary punishments. If Ministers succeed in carrying no more than these measures through Parliament, they will have done something towards rescuing the Session from the charge of barrenness, which is too often, and with great justice, brought against the assembled wisdom of the nation.

But, as already observed, the main topics of the Royal Speech, and of the debates on the Address, related to the affairs of Asia. As was to have been expected, Ministers were closely questioned by the Opposition in both Houses as to the causes and objects of the two wars which the country has on hand. They gave such information as, consistently with a due regard to the public interests, they could venture to lay before Parliament. Wars are like the conflagrations in great cities; the nearer they are to the spectator the more absorbing the interest which they excite. The British nation, intimately connected as it is with India and China, does not yet regard the hostilities in those remote regions with as much intensity of feeling as that with which it watched every incident of the struggle in the Crimea. But we may be sure that, as time wears on, and the plot of the great Eastern drama unfolds itself in all its intricacies, the people will yield to the policy of the Home and the Indian Government that hearty support and co-operation which are essential to the triumph of our arms, the safety of our frontier, and the vindication of our supremacy.

The non-corroboration of the intelligence that, after the brilliant capture of Bushire, the Shah had submitted to our demands, gives additional importance to that portion of the Royal Speech which relates to Persia. If the military fame of Great Britain have suffered in the East, by the blundering incapacity which marked the early stages of the Crimean campaign, and by the secondary part which even in its latest stages was played by our gallant army, the history of the brilliant operations at Bushire and Karrak will go far to restore it. When the Asiatic agents of Russia shall whisper mysteriously of Kars, and place its capture by Mouravieff and the Russians as a set-off against the capture of the Malakoff by Pelissier and the French, the Eastern tribes upon our frontier, and the people of Persia, will remember the fall of Bushire, and the skill as well as prowess of our commanders and troops, and bend with wholesome terror, largely tinctured with admiration, before the might and majesty of England.

The same reasons do not regulate our policy towards China. It is not a question either of frontier or of security; neither have we to foil the machinations of an aggressive European Power, stirring up against us, for its own purposes, the jealousies of the native population. The quarrel of England with China is the quarrel of the modern and expansive civilisation of Europe against the antiquated and exclusive semi-barbarism of the East. It is the quarrel of France, of the United States, and of every nation that possesses ships and commerce, quite as much as it is our own. In our dispute with Persia we can suffer no interlopers, except they come as enemies, when we shall know how to deal with them. In our dispute with China all the Powers on earth are welcome to interfere. They are all interested in proportion to their wealth and enterprise; and, if the result of the quarrel should be to open up that great empire of the East, to the ideas and trade of the greater empires of the West, the whole world will be the gainer; and China itself will not be among the least of those to whom the shock will give a forward and a beneficial impetus.

The portions of the Speech that relate exclusively to the European policy, past and present, of the nation excited long debates in both Houses. In the Upper House Lord Derby expressed his belief that the foreign policy of the Government had deprived the country of every friend it had in the world except France; and animadverted with especial severity upon the conduct pursued towards the King of Naples;—conduct which, by playing with the great question of Italian liberty, had resulted, as he thought, in making Austrian rule in Italy more fixed and permanent than ever. Mr. Disraeli, in the Lower House, was equally emphatic, though scarcely so correct. The objectors were well answered by the Earl of Clarendon and Lord Palmerston; and the leader of the Opposition in the Commons was more forcibly than politely designated by the Prime Minister as a romancer and a gobemouche. As regards our foreign policy in general, and the amount of revenue to be raised to carry it out, involving, as a necessary consequence, the "war ninepence" which the country seems so indisposed to pay, Mr. Gladstone, will coalesce with Mr. Disraeli. Lord John Russell, like Mr. Disraeli and Lord Derby, disapproves of the course pursued towards Naples—a disapproval in which we believe he has the general sympathy both of the Liberal and the Conservative party; but supports in other respects, though not very warmly or heartily, the European policy of the Government. He seems particularly to regret what he several times called the "acerbity" shown towards Russia in the matter of Bolgrad and the Isle of Serpents; but, as the affair is settled, and as the country deemed that to be proper spirit, to which Lord John Russell has chosen to give a more unpleasant designation, the subject may be well allowed to drop, and to pass quietly into the domain of history.

All parties are satisfied at the approaching termination of the dispute between Prussia and the Swiss Cantons, and at the comforting assurance that her Majesty's Government and that of the Emperor of the French have discovered the means of an amicable settlement. The passage of the Speech that refers to the negotiations with the Government of the United States, and with that of Honduras, in reference to Central America, is particularly gratifying, and will be received by the country, as it was by Parliament, with unmixed satisfaction.

FRANCE.

PARIS, Thursday.

The death of the Princess de Lieven, and the reminiscences and associations to which it and her singular history have given rise, have formed the chief subjects of conversation here. It appears that the Princess had no idea that her end was near, and that the real character of her state was announced to her by M. Guizot. She is said to have received the intimation with perfect resignation, and almost immediately to have sent for the Lutheran pastor, M. Cuvier (Mdme. de Lieven was a Protestant), with whom she had a long conversation. From that time she refused to see any one but her son, Prince Paul de Lieven, M. Guizot, and the Duc de Noailles. Mdme. de Lieven's political career—for it was virtually as real a political career as that of almost any manœuvre diplomatist of our day—is too generally known to make it our place to enter thereupon. But her private character presented certain traits less familiar to the general world. Among these her remarkable fidelity to her friends deserves to be cited. Amid the atmosphere of intrigue, [illegible] political blandishments in which she found herself—[illegible] encircled, she adhered constantly to those who had once gained her regard; and, for one in such a position, and [illegible]; to such a nation, this merit was no small one. It seems, however, somewhat generally acknowledged that Madame de Lieven had a little survived her day, and she has for some years been looked upon rather as a relic and a tradition belonging to an order of things gone by than as an important and influential personage of the day; and even the réunions of her salons bore a certain trace of this feeling.

A series of balls are taking place at the Tuileries, the Hôtel de Ville, and among the ambassadorial, ministerial, and other public circles. In the, Chaussée d'Antin a few houses are open, in the Faubourg St. Honoré yet fewer, and in the Faubourg St. Germain none. Money, with the prices of all the necessaries, as well as of the luxuries, is the order of the day, and we may, we believe, with safety assert that Paris is at present by far the dearest residence in [illegible].

The details of the execution of the wretched criminal Vuyer, [illegible] full of a horror that excites but too much interest. His cries and frantic resistance, which nothing but the exercise of force could overcome, when summoned to execution, [illegible] cowardice of the patient, which hesitated not in the execution of [illegible] darkest, most odious crimes. The report of the medical commission charged to examine into his state of mind was presented to the Emperor by Dr. Conneau. It declared him to be in a condition that rendered him perfectly responsible for his acts, notwithstanding the somewhat abnormal excitement under which he laboured; and the Emperor, on the faith of this report, is said at once to have rejected Verger's petition for pardon, unexamined. The father of the assassin was porter of a house in the Rue de Seine, and, though immediately after the execution of the crime he left the place, the house is still besieged by crowds of idlers, come expressly to see "le père de l'assassin." Among the persons who presented themselves at the prison—many having come expressly from the provinces—in the intention of converting the criminal, was a lady, who, having vainly sought admission, drew forth a medal, requesting the aumônier to swallow it, assuring him that his immediate conversion would infallibly be the consequence. Pretty well for the nineteenth century!

It is said that the visit of the Grand Duke Constantine is likely to take place about April.

The sixth volume of the "Mémoires du Duc de Raguse" produces even a greater sensation than those which have preceded it. It is full of new and startling revelations respecting the events and personages of the Napoleon era; of remarkable descriptions of character; and of sagacious and impartial appreciations of the acts and views of the men engaged in the affairs of that day. The great European drama of 1814 is fully entered upon; and this portion of the history, together with two striking descriptive portraits of Napoleon—one as he showed himself before, the other what he became after, Tilsit—are replete with interest and instruction.

The rising belles of the day are the Mdlles. Laffitte, the daughters of M. Charles Laffitte. The elder, a striking brunette of sixteen, has made her début with considerable éclat at the Tuileries; the second, a charming blonde, a year younger, has only, as yet, appeared at the Italian Opera, but has already attracted much admiration by her delicate and somewhat pensive beauty. Both are heiresses, which is rather unjust in the distribution of advantages.

At the Opéra Comique the "Psyché" of MM. Jules Barbier and Michel Carré proves very attractive. The plot is founded on the fable of Apuleius, in which Psyché, by her fatal curiosity, causes the flight of Cupid, or Eros; thence exposes herself unprotected to the wrath of Venus, but is finally saved by Zephyr, sent by Eros to withdraw her from the jealous rage of Aphrodite. The music is charming; and, notwithstanding the material difficulty of rendering, without ridicule, the personages of the mythology, the story is sufficiently well carried out.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

(Extract from a Private Letter.)

CANTON, December 19th, 1856.

IF ever such an affair as peaceful warfare could exist, we see it now in China. Things always go by contraries here. It is hard to say whether the motives of Admiral Seymour are yet fairly appreciated; but I doubt not that, if he continues in the course he appears to have laid out for himself, incalculable benefits will be derived from his bold, dashing, but humane policy. All that is to be feared is that some hanging diplomacy may ruin all the good his acts may be beginning to accomplish. It must appear strange to English notions that the chief act on the Admiral's part during the last month is to take forts which he previously captured. You must learn and think a good deal before you can realise the Admiral's position. Dragged, perhaps unwillingly and unwittingly, into warfare operations, he has carefully watched over the future events that might arise from his proceedings. Instead of, in the first instance, destroying every fort he took, he only captured one stronghold after another, resting contented with dismantling each, and trusting that each new success on his part might bring the existing dispute to a satisfactory issue. The forts were left entire, so that they could readily be rearmed by the Chinese to protect themselves from rebellion or plundering natives when trade could again be amicably conducted with foreigners. Had he utterly destroyed the forts at first, the Government would not have been in a position to give safe guarantees to future trade. Now the Government is not able to do so. Mistaking the Admiral's clemency, the Governor-General rearmed some of the forts. This act has resulted in the destruction of nearly all. It has led him into open warfare with the Americans too, and made his position on the river entirely at the mercy of foreigners so long as they choose to hold possession of the forts gained, and laid it open to any inroad that may be attempted by the numerous bands of rebels who swarm throughout the province.

The recapture of the forts that had been evacuated was nearly as easy as when the Chinese said they were unprepared. Their preparations were made at leisure, and appeared to be perfected; yet the Bogue forts, with their hundreds of guns, passed unheeded at first, were readily taken when fully manned. The great stronghold of their defence in the immediate vicinity of Canton fell a second time into Sir Michael Seymour's power. Every possible effort had been made to make the French Folly impregnable: batteries had been erected outside, picked troops were encamped close by to man them whenever an attack was made. A force had been sent against the place, but returned, as it appeared to be advisable that no risk of repulse should be incurred, the place was so well adapted for defence.

However, on the 6th December, the Admiral determined to take the fort, batteries and all. I was in the Dutch Folly when the fort was being taken, and entered the French Folly when we had got possession. It was a beautiful morning; the sun rose brightly, peacefully shining on the quiet and placid river, but the waters bore a warlike flotilla that was soon to change the scene to the fierceness of war. What stately grandeur there is in the steady movements of the two great steamers as they take up their position—the Encounter first, then the Barrosa—the armed boats with the storming party pulling impatiently about their more heavily-armed protectors. At a given signal, crash went the guns of the two ships and the powerful battery of the Dutch Folly at the devoted fort. The range was perfect—shot after shot, shell after shell, poured in with astounding force; the mercenaries bursting as they struck made the fire from the fort appear to be more powerful than it really was. They would be "braves" indeed who would stand to their guns under such a well-directed fire. Yet there were some who did remain; they fired with some effect, too. Both steamers were struck; and, when the Dutch Folly sixty-eight pounder pitched a shot beautifully into the fort, a gun was trained and fired in return, but, feebly dropping quietly into the water after a long train of ricochetting, the shot served as a signal of powerlessness, and the order was given for the boats to advance. What a noble sight it is to see such specks on the vast advance fearlessly to the very cannon's mouth! They escaped the shower of grape scattered plentifully about them. The sharp crack of a few Minié rifles are heard; a wild cheer; and then more firing. The boats reach the very ports of the fort; some dash at the batteries. No fire will retard them; not even rockets, hissing fury in the faces of the men, stop the determined onslaught! Such daring cannot be withstood: the defenders of the fort are panic-stricken; the batteries deserted; and, with the loss to us of only one man, the whole fortress and its additional protections are, in a short ten minutes from the time the boats attached, in undoubted possession. The first trophy is the flag: the characters emblazoned thereon bear the vaunting title, "The fort that shall never be taken."

The first shot was fired at half-past six in the morning. Before six hours were over the walls had been ruined; and the powerful, subtle, still fragrant gas hurled into the air by eighteen quietly successful explosions. But a feeble attempt was made to recover the place. A severe lesson was taught to those who attempted it. They only dare resist under cover of houses. All the houses were burned. Surely the Chinese will now know the inutility of continuing a warfare where they are so palpably unsuccessful. The whole city would at once know of their discomfiture, and the salvos of the exploding mines would ring forth a cry of victory in our favour that will not readily be forgotten. A mass of ruins stand as a speaking monument of our success.

It is a pity that no more forts remain for our naval forces to attack within the Bogue. The city will no doubt be spared until sufficient land force arrives to take firm possession with power to protect the inhabitants. It would reap a well-merited destruction if any attempt is made upon the Admiral's position, but such an attempt is scarcely to be expected. The Chinese people would prevent it, knowing what would be the consequences. Oh how much could be written on this point! How sadly have the Chinese and the Chinese affairs been misjudged in high quarters! Where will the difficulties end that have been begun by the ignorance and folly of some of our officials in the East? If our diplomatists only managed their affairs as successfully as our present naval Commander-in-Chief there might be some hope for progress in China. But, while our Plenipotentiaries have successively been deluded by the Mandarins that the people are our enemies, and that our trade must be restricted, how can any advance be made? The foreign trade is fettered by our own regulations; and, while the natives strive to push their commerce forward with foreigners with most persevering energy, their efforts are checked by thieving officials, who try to keep us from mixing with the people, lest we may suffer injury from them.

THE WAR IN ASIA.

Although we have no direct positive intelligence from the seat of war in Asia, various stray items of information have come to hand which indicate the occurrence of important events. Thus, from Constantinople we learn that Heidar Khan, at the head of a cavalry brigade, had taken Furrah, and was advancing to attack the Persian army under Murad Khan; and that an English division, under Sir John Lawrence, is marching towards Candahar.

The Moniteur de l'Armée publishes a communication from Persia, in which is announced what it terms "a serious fact," that the most important provinces of Afghanistan, without whose assistance the British army could not undertake a campaign in the interior of Persia, had declared for the Shah. It is added, that the Governor of Invia, who had entertained an idea of sending an expedition to Cabul, had wisely abandoned it, having received positive information that he could not rely on the troops of Dost Mahommed. It is said that, since then, the whole of Candahar had declared for Persia. The tribes of the Douraness, who are contiguous to that province, and who are regarded as the most powerful in the country, had prevailed on the Governours and the other chiefs to send a deputation to Teheran. These deputies were admitted to an audience on the 7th December by Nadir Eddin Shah, to whom they presented the tribute of their homage. The city of Candahar, situate on the left bank of the river Urgandaub, in a magnificent and fertile plain, and in the richest portion of Affghanistan, is a strategic point of the greatest importance. It commands the three roads by which British India may be approached. The district called Candahar, of which the city is the capital, comprises three provinces with a population of 1,500,000 inhabitants, and a standing army of 30,000 men supplied by the various tribes which inhabit it. The occupation of the town of Herrah by the Persians had considerable influence on the Affghans, and that of the population of the entire of Western Affghanistan. The Moniteur de l'Armée regards the plan of the General commanding the British army in the Persian Gulf, as developed by the attack on Bushire, as well conceived in a strategic point of view. It thinks that he never intended to advance into the interior of Persia, or into the plains of Affghanistan, but solely to attract the enemy to these points, and to divert their attention, while he established himself on the Persian Gulf. It affirms as a fact that, since the capture of Bushire, the British Commissioner who accompanied the expedition has proposed terms of peace to the Shah, and among the conditions imposed on that the Persian Government is the right of the British to in future possess an establishment in the Persian Gulf. Such an establishment is of the first consequence for the navigation of the Euphrates and for the new railway which is to connect that river with the Mediterranean. That is the gist of the question. "Such," says the Moniteur de l'Armée, "is the plan of the British Government, always so persevering and so correct in their point of view with respect to the interest of the East India Company." The reply of the Shah to the propositions of the British Commissioner cannot be known for at least a month, in consequence of the season and the distance from Teheran to Bushire.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

The Moniteur of Thursday contains an article on the question of the union of the Danubian Principalities. The Plenipotentiary of France at the Conference of Vienna had stated it as his opinion that it was the combination best suited to assure to those provinces the strength necessary to become a bulwark for the Ottoman empire. The French Government had since ceased to profess the same opinion, and what has recently taken place between it and the other Cabinets has only tended to confirm it in its convictions. It does not despair of seeing them prevail in the councils of the Powers, and that the one most interested will admit that the union of the Principalities has nothing which is not completely in accordance with the rights or suzerainty of the Sublime Porte with regard to the Danubian Principalities.

The Presse d'Orient, Jan. 20, states that the Commission for the Principalities was received yesterday by the Sultan.

The Porte is preparing an amnesty for all the emigrant Moldo-Valachians.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the Royal mail steam-ship Asia at Liverpool, on Monday last, we have intelligence from New York to the 21st ult.

The only important business which had been done in Congress was the discussion of the Tariff Bill by the House of Representatives in Committee, which had been continued for several successive days. In the course of this debate Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, stated that a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means desired, by the extension of the free list, to give incidental protection to iron and that the bill offered would reduce the annual receipts more than 10,000,000 dollars. It was also their intention to simplify the collection of the revenue, and to materially reduce the expenses of the Custom Houses. Mr. Akers, of Missouri, made a speech in vindication of the principles of the American party. Mr. Durfee, of Rhode Island, advocated protection for American manufactures; and politics speeches were made by Messrs. Keitt, of South Carolina, and Bliss, of Ohio. Mr. Keitt, so far from regarding the slavery agitation as being quieted by the election of Mr. Buchanan, thought that the tendency of affairs was still more towards the formation of geographical parties, and a dissolution of the Union; but he believed the South abundantly able to take care of herself, and avowed it to be her policy to extend her institutions into adjoining countries, the Governments of which were failing, and the people of which were degenerating into mongrelism.

The charges of corruption which have been brought against some members of Congress continue to excite great attention. Mr. Raymond, the editor of the New York Daily Times, was examined by the Committee of Investigation of the House of Representatives on the 16th. He declined to state the name of the writer of the article in the Times of the 6th, in which those charges were publicly made, but avowed his responsibility for it.

The defeat of Colonel Forney, and the re-election of Mr. Cameron to the Senate, by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, has greatly astonished the Pro-Slavery men, who thought themselves sure of the Quaker State. The re-election of Mr. Sumner to the Senate, now that the numbers are given, is not calculated to allay the fears of the Democrats.

No senator was ever elected or re-elected by Massachusetts with such complete unanimity as Mr. Sumner. In the House 333 members voted for him, and only 12 "scattering votes" were cast; while the Senate elected him by a vote of acclamation—every senator was in his seat. The enthusiasm which was manifested in the city of Boston and throughout Massachusetts has never been equalled. It is the highest testimonial of regard that ever was paid under similar circumstances to a citizen of the Republic.

Advices from California to Dec. 20 had been received at New York. The news is important. The Supreme Court had pronounced a decision to the effect, that by the constitution of the State, no public debt could be contracted by the Government of California exceeding the sum of 300,000 dols., unless previously consented to and ratified by a direct vote of the people. Business at San Francisco was represented as dull, but a demand had recently sprung up for real estate, which had caused a rise.

Advices from Mexico state that the revolution at San Luis Potosi had been completely suppressed, and that Comonfort's position was good. All the eminent military chieftains, including Alvarez and Vidaurri, gave him a hearty support.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THE opening of Parliament by Commission is but a negative proceeding. The ceremonial which surrounds the delivery of the Speech by the Queen in person acts as an impulse upon the Session; it seems to give it a vigorous start: whereas when the function is committed to Royal Commissioners the affair partakes rather too much of the character of a burlesque in some respects—for instance, take the singular cocked hats which in modern times do duty for Peers' coronets;—and in others it is cold and languid, as well as tedious.

It was in this way that on Tuesday last the Session of 1857 was inaugurated. There was accordingly but a thin gathering of Peers in the House of Lords at two o'clock; and the spectators were few, and sombre in their appearance. Nor did the members of the House of Commons think it necessary to assemble in any great number in the early part of the day. There was no Cabinet Minister present; and the leaders of the Opposition were not at hand to accompany the Speaker when he proceeded, at the summons of Black Rod, to the Upper House. At the moment of his departure "Big Ben," on whom a trial had been going on at intervals during the morning, suddenly began to toll in a most measured and lugubrious fashion. The sound was that of a passing bell; and a superstitious punster declared that it portended the dissolution of Parliament.

At a quarter to four the aspect of the House of Commons became more cheerful: members were beginning to feel more at home; and as the familiar voice of Mr. Hayter broke on their ears while performing one of his duties—the moving of new writs for seats vacant among the Liberals—they began to assume that peculiar conventional tone which every one of them so unmistakably adopts after he has been a month an M.P.

There was the usual stir and movement when they heard that Mr. W. Cowper was to have the charge of the education of the country, and that Mr. Monsell was to turn to account the experience he had acquired at the Board of Ordnance, by taking care of the health of the metropolis; and they laughed when the vacancy announced for Clonmel proved that Mr. John O'Connell had sunk from a martyr patriot, into a small placeman. In the mean time the House was filling fast. The Ministers were ranged on the Treasury bench; and the Peelites, in the persons of Messrs. Gladstone, Sidney Herbert, and Cardwell (Sir James Graham was absent), ranged themselves by the side of the Manchester party, including Messrs. Cobden and Milner Gibson, on their usual seats. Of the chiefs of the Opposition Mr. Disraeli was the last to appear. Lord Stanley, although he gave his sanction to the renewed cohesion of the Conservative party by joining Mr. Disraeli's Parliamentary dinner the day before, left his accustomed seat and went into the gallery above, where he remained during the greater part of the debate. Soon two gentlemen, looking stiff and perplexed in that combination of scarlet cloth and silver lace which marks the office of Deputy Lieutenant, were observed to hasten in an uncomfortable manner up the floor, and endeavour to hide themselves on the second seat behind the Treasury bench—they were the mover and seconder of the Address. And at about a quarter to five Sir John Ramsden, the member for Taunton, commenced, in a clear, loud voice—the tones of which bore a singular resemblance to those of Mr. Disraeli, and which somewhat neutralised the effect of his youthful and rather feminine appearance—the delivery of a set speech, which was a very fair specimen of juvenile oratory. A less happy fate awaited Sir Andrew Agnew, who followed him. He had either not condescended to learn or had forgotten his lesson, and the result was that he only just escaped what is technically called a breakdown. In the course of the day it was rumoured that it was the intention of Mr. Disraeli to open the budget of intelligence with regard to the foreign policy of Ministers (which he gathered in Paris in the last few weeks), as soon as the Address was moved. Nevertheless, the eager restlessness of Mr. Gladstone was observed to portend an attempt to catch the Speaker's eye; and Sir Bulwer Lytton was seen to crouch in the attitude which a man assumes when he is about to start to his feet; while the leader of the Opposition leaned back in his seat with that impassive listlessness which characterises his demeanour in the House. However, at the right moment Mr. Disraeli appeared at the table, and Mr. Gladstone was forced, by the implied rule of the House, to yield to him. Of Mr. Disraeli's speech it may be said that the beginning was cumbrous and circumlocutory, the middle vigorous and animated, and the end financial, and therefore a failure. Finance is the very bête noire of the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer. On the whole, although it was probably somewhat modified, in consequence of Mr. Disraeli having preceded him, Mr. Gladstone's speech was more dangerous to the Ministry than that of the avowed leader of the Opposition. All allegiance to the compact which brought the coalition Government of Lord Aberdeen together was thrown off, and there was an earnestness about him which Lord Palmerston must have felt to be telling, as his Lordship immediately made one of his best efforts to do away with its effects; although in fact his speech was a reply to Mr. Disraeli. There was eminent tact in this. It would not have done to have been jocose on Mr. Gladstone—first, because he is still nominally the Premier's "right honourable friend;" and, secondly, because his speech did not admit of being taken in a jesting point of view. But the "right hon. gentleman opposite" was fair game, and very good game was made of him. It cannot but strike any one who is in the habit of looking on in the House of Commons how singular is Lord Palmerston's position. He has not one debater in his Ministry at once able and safe. It needs, therefore, the utmost tact in him so to time his speeches as that he may embrace and reply to the main points of the discussion, and yet not leave himself exactly in the necessity of making his speech a mere summary of the debate. On Tuesday night, in spite of all his management, he was obliged to trust himself to the tender mercies of a subtle and experienced Parliamentary speaker, who, as well as Mr. Disraeli, has employed the recess in informing himself on foreign policy in a foreign country. The only difference is that Mr. Disraeli has been in France and Lord John Russell in Florence. At one time the circumstance of Lord John Russell addressing the House of Commons from a back bench, and commanding an audience of about fifty members only, would have been a world's wonder; but so it was on the first night of this Session. There was something suspicious in his attempt to follow Lord Palmerston; and the first few sentences of candid praise of his "noble friend" which he uttered were the sure harbinger of the bitter lecture which succeeded. In short, the severest blows which the Government received on that night were from their flank and their rear. It may, perhaps, be said that, judging from his appearance, Lord John has found macaroni a sustaining and invigorating edible.

After this the debate languished through Mr. Milner Gibson, and ended in a drone with Mr. Hadfield; and, except that it threatened to inundate the Ministry with motions on the subject of the Income-tax, it has given no decided indication of the policy of their opponents. It was said, however, that if a division had been forced on it might have ended in the defeat of the Government.

That such was not the intention of Lord Derby and his party, the course he took in the Upper House sufficiently proves. The proceedings in that House were in a degree parallel to those in the Commons, for no sooner had the mover and seconder of the Address satisfactorily convinced their audience of their political nonentity (indeed the very identity of one of them was in question, and whether it was Earl Cowper or the Earl of Airlie who seconded the Address was a matter of doubt) than Lord Derby rose. On the first night of a Session the noble Earl is really delightful. His vivacity is so genuine, and his pleasure at having the opportunity of giving the reins to his eloquent tongue so apparent, that one is inclined to forgive his occasional bitterness, and the chuckle with which he delivers a bit of [illegible] rule. Perhaps, as a whole, his speech on this occasion was not one of his very happiest efforts, but still its sparkle and brilliancy contrasted strongly with the dreamy calmness of that of Lord Clarendon. After Lord Grey had once again, in his keenest and shrillest style, asserted his claim to head the Peace party, the interest of the debate passed away, for Lord Granville spoke not a word of the Russian [illegible] and only seemed to wish to signify that he was tired of the leadership of the Upper House. The division on the amendment of Lord Grey was a needless trouble, and in its result was more of a triumph than otherwise to the Government.

And so ended the first night of the Session of 1857.

THE INCOME-TAX.—MEETING AT BOSTON.

A crowded meeting, convened by requisition, was held at Boston, on the 27th ult., the Mayor in the chair. Several resolutions, condemnatory of the Income-tax in its present shape, were carried unanimously, and a petition to Parliament adopted, praying that the additional 2d. in the pound be at once repealed. The Rev T. W. Matthews, and Messrs. Noble Chapman, Coupland, Hill, and other gentlemen, took part in the proceedings.

The following letter has been addressed by Mr Herbert Ingram, M.P., to Mr. John Noble, junior, the mover of the first resolution at the meeting:—

HOUSE OF COMMONS, [illegible]

Dear Sir,—I see by the reports in the public papers that [illegible] on Income-tax meeting at Boston. Now, I am quite sure [illegible] tently agreed in opinion that the small trader and the hard-[illegible] sional man, ought not to pay in proportion to the [illegible] and other proprietors or what is called realised property; at the same time, I am sure you cannot possibly wish that persons best able to pay should escape. The plan generally proposed—that of capitalising incomes—to remedy the inequality of the Property and Income Tax would only increase the evil. Now just look at its operation in practice. We will take the first person in the empire after the Sovereign, the Prime Minister: his income, if valued, is not worth three months' purchase in the market. Then take all the other Ministers: all these would entirely escape in the operation of capitalising income. Then take the Bishops, the highly-endowed clergy, the large-salaried persons under Government—all would escape with scarcely anything to pay. The large profit-making traders in London, and all persons of that class, would escape with a very small amount of taxation; in fact, the amount to be levied would be so reduced that a serious deficiency in the revenue would occur, and the amount of indirect taxation must be increased.

It is startling, with the declining [illegible] in the country that [illegible] property should [illegible] the State that [illegible] family out of the [illegible] Police. To consistent those contributions ought to be discontinued: as, clearly, these grants are a relief to real property.

With respect to the taxes on the labouring classes they now pay 8s. in the pound in the shape of duties on tea, coffee, [illegible], and I, for one, must resist any further burdens in this quarter.

I think the mode and machinery of assessment of the Income-tax is most oppressive and arbitrary; and I have given notice to bring the matter before the House with a view to the improvement generally of collecting the Inland Revenue.

I hope my constituents will not aid any movement for increasing the indirect taxation of the country, heavily pressing, as it does, on the industry and commerce of the country.

I have the pleasure of stating that I have every reason to believe the Income-tax will be immediately reduced to 7d. in the pound.

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

John Noble, Jun., Esq., Boston. HERBERT INGRAM.

BEER MEASURES.

SOME curious statistics of the beer trade, showing how the perennial streams of "malt and hops" in a state of decoction are prepared and distributed, appear in a return printed by order of the House of Commons, on the instance of Mr. Apsley Pellatt. The status exhibited is that obtained from the issue of licenses during the year 1855. At that time, it seems, there were in all England only 2290 licensed as "common brewers"—i.e., who manufactured the article for others to sell. The Atlantic Ocean of fluid furnished by this select band was distributed among the English lieges by no fewer than 185,144 retailers, either classed as "victuallers," or merely licensed to sell beer, to be drunk or not drunk on their premises, according to circumstances. There were, besides, an auxiliary corps of 38,791 persons authorised to retail beer of their own brewing. In all Scotland, under the fiery despotism of whisky, the humbler beverage finds but 130 wholesale manufacturers; and 12,977 retailers, of whom 3339 are entitled "grocers;" and 137 persons licensed to brew their own beer. Ireland possesses 104 brewers, and 16,051 retailers of beer. There is no publican in the sister isle who seems to think it worth while taking out a license to brew his own beer.

Among the English counties, Yorkshire, from its size and population, enjoys the greatest number of brewers, having 259; and 12,337 retailers of various description. Lancashire, however, ran very near in the thirsty race, with its 253 brewers; and can boast of a greater number of retailers, namely, 17,679;—its great superiority being in the class of persons merely licensed to sell beer to be drunk on the premises. In London and Middlesex there are 115 licensed brewers; and in Kent, which also supplies the metropolitan market, 114. The adjacent counties of Surrey, Sussex, and Suffolk have also 248 among them. By licensed brewers must not, of course, be understood so many breweries, since all the members of a brewing company must take out a license. The number of retail dealers in the metropolitan counties is unexpectedly small, as compared with Yorkshire and Lancashire, and to the ratio of the inhabitants. There are but 5564, of all denominations, in London and Middlesex. The great brewers, also, possess a close monopoly of the market, only 55 licenses having been taken out by dealers wishful to brew their own beer among a population of some three millions.

The smallest number of brewers in any English county is in little Rutland, where there are but 2 and 129 retailers—helped out, however, by 75 dealers, who sell their own brewage. The Principality stands low in the schedule of beer-drinking. Throughout its twelve counties there are only 87 brewers, of which number three counties—Glamorgan, Denbigh, and Cardigan—monopolise 50. The number of retailers is pretty large, being 6558, besides the 4677 persons who brew as well as sell their own beer—or, should we say, own?—on their own premises.

THE LINE OF OLIVER CROMWELL.—The Cromwells still live—the line of Oliver, in direct descent from the veritable Oliver that drove out the "Rump Parliament," still lives! A part of the family lives in Clay county, Indiana. They are farmers, rather mediocrity in their vicinity: intelligent, and in full possession of the family history, they still keep up the name of Oliver in every family. Oliver Cromwell Howe lies in the cemetery at Hamburg-green. He died there, an aged, respected and venerated citizen of Clay county, in 1855. If France did not find the missing Dauphin in Ebenezer Williams, England can find her Cromwells in the Hoosier State.—Ohio Statesman.

A GOOD INVENTION.—We [illegible] Berlin on the 29th, and came directly hither, a distance of 180 miles by railroad. I noticed in the car a new contrivance for warming the [illegible] which in our case was wholly successful. Long, flat boxes of [illegible] ne, covered with carpeting and filled with hot sand, are placed upon the floor, between the seats, so that the passengers on both sides can make use of them. These boxes were milky warm when we started, and not quite so when we arrived at Hamburg, eight hours afterwards. Bayard Taylor in the New York Tribune.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Queen has appointed the Duke of Rutland to the office of Lord Lieutenant of Leicestershire, vacant by the death of the late Duke of Rutland.

NEW SCHOOL-CHURCH OF ST. PETER'S, STEPNEY.

SCHOOL-CHURCH AT STEPNEY.

On Saturday, January 31, a school-church was publicly opened at St. Peter's, Stepney, by the Lord Bishop of London. This building, as its name denotes, includes the work of a school, and a means of bringing home to the labouring classes the services of the Church.

The district consists of 13,000, mostly of poor and labouring people, chiefly dock labourers, and this room will enable the active and energetic pastor, the Rev. T. J. Rowsell—who has laboured most earnestly and successfully for thirteen years—to assist and instruct those who from various causes do not go to church. St. Peter's Church itself is always well filled, and on Sunday evenings crowded with poor; but this new room will enable many of the poorest to say prayers together with their pastor, and hear God's word read and preached.

The cost of the building is £1550. It was built by Mr. Charles Barry, and is a fine and well-proportioned room. A large and influential company assembled; and, after a very warm and affectionate address from the Bishop, he expressed his hearty approval and sanction to this work in all its bearings, specially sanctioning the use of the room, as an opportunity of guiding the recreation of the labouring people.

The Rev. T. J. Rowsell then addressed the meeting, and, in his usual peculiar style of eloquent affection, explained the objects for which the room had been built, the deep anxiety which attended the realisation of the necessary funds, and the absolute necessity which existed that the increasing wants of the poor for the services of the Church should be more generally felt and acknowledged. The rev. gentleman most powerfully depicted the sad and baneful effects of the system of sequestration which existed in the parish of Stepney, and which so vitally affected the true interests of the Church; and the enthusiastic plaudits which greeted this part of Mr. Rowsell's speech must have convinced the right rev. prelate how completely this pernicious system is detested in the neighbourhood in which it has now for some time been in operation.

He was succeeded by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., who was warmly received, and his eloquent and touching speech was listened to with eager attention. He very earnestly set forth the duties of the West-end towards the East, and implored the richer members of the Church to act up to their solemn responsibilities. He reminded them that, being at a distance, instead of lessening, actually increased, the demands upon their love and co-operation as a locality thus deprived of the rich members were unable to cope with its difficulties.

The Rev. F. D. Maurice, in a few but touching remarks, said that the West-end had as much good to receive for themselves in their sympathy with and care for the real manful life of the East as it could bestow upon them by education and money.

The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. W. W. Champneys, W. Cotton, Esq., Rev. Dr. Hessey, and Mr. Churchwarden Lilley, who briefly expressed in the name of the people the happiness which they felt in the presence and kind sympathy of the Bishop, and also to those present whose Christian generosity had erected the building, and testified the high esteem and deep affection which they entertained for their beloved pastor, and their appreciation of his excellent Church-teaching and his truly consistent life.

It was a gratifying day to the anxious Pastor of this densely-populated district, and also to his truly excellent wife, who fully participates in all his care and exertions for the welfare of his people, and whose large-hearted loving sympathy is deeply felt by all those who have the happy privilege of being brought within her influence; and it is hoped that the amount still due on account of this useful and necessary work will be raised to ease the anxieties of the clergyman, and that some of the richer members of the Church of England will send help to this poor district, in which so arduous a task is being so actively set about. It deserves confidence and help. There will be here 1000 children under instruction in this one district, connected with St. Peter's Church.

HALSTEAD HALL, NEAR HORNCASTLE.

About an hour before midnight on Sunday, the 7th of December last, the inhabitants of the village of Stixwould were aroused from sleep by an alarm of fire. The stackyard at Halstead, about three-quarters of a mile from the village, was enveloped in flame, and the produce of more than one hundred acres of valuable corn was in a very brief period completely destroyed. The area of flame exceeded that produced by the largest fires in Manchester or Liverpool. As the wind was almost a hurricane from S.W., and the yard had been fired right in the wind's eye, it was impossible to save more than the two cornstacks, and the fine old barn and outbuildings, which are not shown in the Sketch. A reward of £100 has been offered for the discovery of the incendiary. Hitherto no clue has been found, although Mr. Hitchins, the able Coroner for this part of Lincolnshire, held an inquest, and made a most searching investigation.

About thirty years since a burglary with violence was committed at Halstead, which was then in the occupation of Mr. W. Elsey. Three of the offenders were executed, and two transported.

Halstead appears in former times to have been a much larger house. It was the residence of the family of Townshend, as the following extract from the parish register shows:—

Mr. George Townshend, Esq., died at Halstead, and was buryed att Waddingworth, on Wenadaie nighte, the XIIIth of February, 1627

Marriages: Anno 1621.
Francis Fawcett, of the age of 23 years, marryed to Anne Hemidge, of the age of 21 years, upon Sater Daie, the 27th Daie of January, 1621.

It appears, however, that the bliss of the venerable bridegroom was but of short duration, by the next entry:—

Burialls. Anno 1621.
Francis Fawcett, the above named, was buryed the 8th day of February, 1621, having been but 12 daies marryed.

CLERGY ORPHAN SCHOOLS CANTERBURY.

The erection of these Schools originated in the accommodation for children in the schools of the Clergy Orphan Corporation at St. John's Wood having become insufficient. It was, therefore, determined to appropriate that building exclusively to girls, and to erect elsewhere a school sufficiently large to contain 200 boys, and fitted up for the immediate reception of at least one-half that number. The Rev. Dr. Warneford, with characteristic munificence, provided a site at Canterbury, at a cost of upwards of £3000, and also offered £4000 towards the erection of a new school for boys, together with £2000 to found scholarships.

On June 29th, 1854, Dr. Blomfield, Bishop of London, laid the first stone of the boys' school, on the site given, at St. Thomas's-hill, Canterbury. The building is calculated for the reception of 120 boys, but is so arranged that it can be enlarged to receive 200.

Mr. P. C. Hardwick was the architect; Mr. Kelk was the contractor. The amount of contract is £15,000. The materials are Kentish rag and Caen stone. The dormitories extend over the whole of the upper story. Each boy has a separate cubicle, which is formed by partitions, about 7 feet high; and a separate infirmary is provided.

As the number of children which the buildings of the Corporation will in future be able to admit is nearly double what it has hitherto been, a proportionate increase in the annual subscriptions or permanent income is indispensably necessary in order to maintain the institution in efficiency. The object is an excellent one, and should have general support.

THE CLERGY ORPHAN SCHOOLS, CANTERBURY: THE CHAPEL.

The Clergy Orphan Schools were originally founded A.D. 1749, and incorporated 1809.

The cost of the new building at Canterbury will be £15,500, exclusive of the expenses of furnishing, and of the Chapel, which, with its fittings, is estimated at £3000

The girls, continuing at St. John's Wood, will thus have the accommodation which has been long and greatly needed; and provision will also be made for an addition to their numbers, for which the growing necessities of the clergy urgently call.

Reduction of Armaments.—The Moniteur of Saturday last publishes a decree reducing the strength of the army, with a view to place it upon a peace footing. The official journal says:—"In order to gradually reduce the army to a peace footing, the Emperor has just ordered 46,000 temporary and renewable furloughs to be granted. A similar ones to the number of 85,000 had been previously issued, making the total of the soldiers thus sent to their homes for an unlimited period 141,000. These 46,000 new furloughs are to be divided among the classes of 1850, 1851, 1852, and 1853, according to a list drawn up by the Minister of War."

French Gambling.—I understand that the recent circular against gambling in cafés was provoked by a statement affecting persons connected with the Court. Stories have been told of young men having lost 40,000 and 50,000 francs, and of marriages having been broken off in consequence; but people now speak of 800,000 francs having been lost in a single evening, and of a very high personage having been compelled to interfere personally to square the account. Letter from Paris.

LYING-IN-STATE AND FUNERAL OF THE LATE DUKE OF RUTLAND, K.G.

THE LATE DUKE OF RUTLAND, K.G.—FROM THE PORTRAIT BY G. SANDERS.

THE LATE DUCHESS OF RUTLAND.—FROM THE PORTRAIT BY G. SANDERS.

THE sympathy and sorrowful interest attached to the last honours to the remains of John Henry, the fifth Duke of Rutland, would, if proof were wanting, testify the reverential affection in which his Grace was held by all around him. In an eloquent éloge in the Derbyshire Advertiser he is worthily characterised by the writer Spencer T. Hall as "a man who would in any circumstances have been an ornament to humanity. There was that in him which would have given dignity to the most humble post it threw a halo round the very lofty position to which, in the order of Providence, he was born. He respected himself, but scorned no one, and all who knew him justly loved him. Intense in his affections and firm in his principles he was in his domestic relations a model, in his friendships unfaltering, and in his patriotism, if not unequalled, at least unsurpassed, by any nobleman of his day."

THE LYING-IN-STATE.

The first portion of the funeral ceremonies the Lying-in-State took place on Tuesday and Wednesday week (Jan. 27 and 28) at Belvoir Castle, when, notwithstanding the severity of the weather, 3017 persons attended the first day, and 2674 on the second, making a total of nearly 4000 visitors, nine-tenths of whom were tenants and their families. It formed the subject of general remark that the first five men who presented themselves for admission at ten o'clock on Tuesday morning were five labourers from the Duke's estates in Rutland-shire who had consequently walked a distance of twenty-six miles to pay their last tribute of respect; and who, as they returned to their homes the same evening, actually performed a day's journey of fifty two miles on foot to accomplish this act of personal devotion.

On arriving at the castle the tenantry and other visitors were conducted through the porch along the entrance passage into the guard-room; here the approaches and walls were hung with black drapery. The coffin was placed on an elevated bier in the space at the foot of the guard-room staircases, which was also surrounded with black cloth with the l[illegible] suspended at the head. The covering of the oak coffin was of [illegible] velvet, decorated with gilt ornaments.

At the [illegible] of the coffin, on a cushion, were placed the Ducal Coronet [illegible] the Duke's own Star and Garter, composed of brilliants supposed to be worth £12,000. The breastplate, surrounded by different badges of honour, was surmounted by the Duke's Arms. The inscription-plate of the coffin bore the following:—

The Most Noble
HENRY, DUKE OF RUTLAND,
Marquess [illegible] Manner of Holdon,
Lord [illegible]
[illegible]
Born January, 1778 —Died 20th January, 1857.

The crossed swords, the dress sword of his Grace as a Knight of the Garter, and his regimental sword as Colonel of the Leicestershire Militia, were most displayed on the top of the coffin, along with the [illegible] spurs of Knighthood of the Order of the Garter set with [illegible] diamonds, and the [illegible] besides the blue ribbon and badge. At the foot of the coffin hung the Knight's Gold Collar of SS., and at the foot of the coffin underneath were grouped on either hand his Grace's mantle of ermine and velvet as Knight of the Garter; his Cambridge robes as D.C.L.; his hat as Colonel of the Leicestershire Militia, and his military sash.

A servant seated on each side, dressed in mourning, completed the mournful group, which the visitors having surveyed, they were conducted from the Castle through the porter's lodge. The greatest influx of visitors took place on Wednesday, when special trains conveyed the country from Bakewell, Ilkeston, and the Derbyshire estates of his Grace. Mr. Pole Thornhill, M.P.; Mr. Freer, Clerk of the Peace for Leicestershire; and W. Eaton, Esq., Mayor of Grantham, as representing the Corporation, were amongst the earlier visitors.

We have engraved, at page 107, the Arrival of the Tenantry at the Castle [illegible]; and, at page 110, the Remains Lying in State in the [illegible]-chamber of the Castle: this was not, however, intended as a [illegible] "first" in the work [illegible] the steward's office, "simply as a means of enabling the late Duke's tenantry, and those immediately connected with the family, to pay a last tribute of respect to his Grace's memory."

THE FUNERAL.

The morning of Thursday was fine, clear, and frosty, and a heavy fall of snow having coated the trees surrounding the Castle, and hung the sup, roaches thereto, presented an air of tristful grandeur.

Cards had been issued from the Castle inviting every tenant of his Grace to be present at the funeral, even if his rent amounted only to a shilling! The number of visitors was, consequently, very large, lining the way from the Castle to the Mausoleum, as far as the spot called the "Horseshoe," where the fine avenue of yew-trees commences.

The mournful cortège set out from the grand entrance of the Castle at a quarter past ten o'clock. The coffin was placed in a night of the multitude, on a mourning-car covered with black cloth. The curved sides of the car, which was seven feet in height to the top of the platform, were draped with black cloth, which descended to within three inches of the ground and covered the wheels. This car, which was manufactured by the Duke's own workpeople at Belvoir Castle, was drawn by four of his Grace's black agricultural horses, which, in their solemn trappings, added greatly to the effect of the pageant.

The following was the order of the procession:—

Mr. Bethell, bearing the Sword and Hat and Spurs
Mr. Cochrane, Clerk of the Works
Mr. Draper, Mr Farmer
Mr. G. R Dibdin
Hays, the Duke's coachman. Fowler, the Duke's footman.
Mr. Kingston, Surgeon, Mr. Shipman, Surgeon, and
Dr. Parsons, the Duke's Physician
Woods, the Duke's valet.
The Rev. W. Selwyn, the Rev. F Mules, and the Rev. H. S. Palmer.
Mr. Douglas, the oldest servant of the family, bearing the Ducal Coronet.

THE COFFIN

Pallbearers. Mr. R. Norman, Rev. O. Norman, Colonel Forrester, Mr. Mr. Norman, Mr. G. Norman, Mr. H. Norman, Rev O. Forrester, and Major Stuart Wortley

Chief Mourner, the eldest son of the deceased, the present Duke.

Mourners, two and two, Lord John Manners, Lord George Manners, Mr. Dru unond, The Hon. and Rev. F. Norman, Mr Edgar Drummond, Captain Drummond, Mr. Cecil Drummond, Lord Forrester, Lord [illegible] Mr Baillie Cochrane, Honourable A. Hervey, Earl of Scarbrough, Earl of Cawdor, Hon. E. Howard, Rev. G. Sumner, Dean [illegible], Mr Manners Sutton, Mr. Howard, Lord Manners, Viscount Canterbury, Mr. Long, the Duke's solicitor, and Mr. Neafield, the Derbyshire agent.

The gentlemen attached to the Castle two and two, as follows:—Mr. Fenton, Mr. Green, Mr. Brooks, Mr. Sickien, Mr. Orpwood, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Parker, Mr. Ingram, Mr. Mansell, Mr. Davis, Mr. Wright, Mr. Cattle, Mr. Goodhall, Mr. Mansell, jun., Mr. Welborn, Mr. Ashman, Mr. Nicholson, and Mr. Kemp. Then followed the under servants.

The mournful procession having reached the avenue leading to the mausoleum, in the order shown in the large Illustration at page 111, the Rev. W. Selwyn (who officiated in consequence of the domestic chaplain, the Rev. F. Mules, suffering from a recent accident) commenced the impressive burial service—"I am the Resurrection and the Life." The coffin, on being borne into the mausoleum, was placed on the platform, and, on the conclusion of the lesson, taken out of the 15th of Corinthians, the coffin, with the ducal coronet and swords, was gradually lowered into the vault prepared for its reception. The funeral service was read with earnest solemnity by the Rev. W. Selwyn, and the responses were given with equal impressiveness by the other reverend gentlemen and members of the family. At the close of the service the mourners returned to the Castle, and the multitude of visitors to their respective abodes.

In the mausoleum is the celebrated monumental group representing the ascending figure of the late Duchess, welcomed by her four children, in the guise of angels. The body of the Duchess was interred in the vault underneath, where the remains of the good old Duke have after the lapse of thirty-one years, been likewise deposited.

Throughout the funeral arrangements the most perfect order prevailed; and the greatest credit is due to Messrs. Green and Fletcher, the stewards, and to Mr. Cochrane, the clerk of the works; to Messrs. Bramley of Grantham; and Mr. Bethell, undertaker, from Farringdon-street, London.

It affords us much satisfaction to add that the inhabitants of Grantham complied with the request of the Mayor to close their shops during the hours of the funeral—from 9 o'clock. This was recommended at a Council meeting, when it was also determined to send an official letter of condolence from the Mayor and burgesses of Grantham to the bereaved family. As the funeral was strictly a private one, this was considered to be the most suitable mode of testifying the respect entertained for the noble family by the residents of Grantham.

The following interesting anecdote of the late Duke of Rutland is given by one who shared, at the time alluded to, the hospitality of his roof:—

"It happened that I and one other private friend spent the last day of the year 1818, which happened to be Sunday, with his Grace at a small old house he has in a very retired part of the Derbyshire Hills. In the morning his Grace and his two guests and a couple of miles to attend the nearest place of worship—a kind of school-house close by one of his estates—but at night the Duke himself read family prayers to his domestic congregation, consisting of his two friends, a few of his ordinary servants, who accompanied him to the Woodhouse, as the place of worship was called, and a larger number of the inferior servants belonging to the locality. After the prayers his Grace read a short sermon—I think one of Paley's—and after that he addressed them by the title of 'kind friends,' praised them for the good order 'in which they had conducted their several duties in the last year,' expressed his satisfaction at having, as he hoped, contributed in return to their welfare and happiness, and hoped that the year which was just about to begin might be equally propitious and prosperous to the whole domestic circle and connection of which he was proud and happy to be, he said not as the master, but the chief partner—the responsible head and guiding hand. I never in my life heard a more appropriate or touching allocution. It was both simple and more in detail than I have been able to give it, though I made my note that evening; and it was followed by a respectful corroborative assent from the little audience, and an affectionate murmur of 'God bless your Grace,' which was very affecting.

The portraits of the late Duke and Duchess of Rutland, on the preceding page, have been copied from the whole-lengths, engraved by John Lucas and Samuel Cousins, in 1820, from the pictures painted by George Sanders. The Duke is represented in the superb costume worn by his Grace at the coronation of George IV.

GREENWICH ELECTION.—General Codrington will probably be returned unopposed, as he is as yet by far the preferable candidate.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1857.

On the first night of the Session Mr. Disraeli made an accusation against the Government which would have been highly damaging had it possessed the simple, but essential, requisite of being true. He asserted that at the very time when Lord Clarendon and the Conference of Paris were debating on the affairs of Italy, with a view to the reformation of the system pursued by the King of Naples, the British and French Governments, with the cognisance and of course the approbation, of Lord Palmerston, had entered into a secret treaty with Austria, guaranteeing to that Power the undisturbed possession of Lombardy and Venice. Lord Palmerston met this statement by a curt and energetic denial; and the damage sought to be inflicted upon the Government by the leader of the Opposition recoiled upon himself. An idea so preposterous ought to have been refused a lodging in a brain generally so clear and well-ordered as that of Mr. Disraeli; but somehow or other it crept in,—or was foisted in by some of the second-rate politicians and first-rate intriguers whose acquaintance the right honourable gentleman made during his recent visit to Paris. Whether Lord Palmerston succeeded in expelling it is a matter of no great moment; for, if Mr. Disraeli still retain the opinion, he has a monopoly of it. At the present moment the retention of Lombardy and Venice by Austria is the greatest danger that menaces the peace of Europe; and although Lord Palmerston—like other British, and no doubt many French, statesmen—would be glad if the Italians would be reconciled to that extraneous rule, and look with respect—not to say with gratitude—upon the hated presence of the "Tedeschi," he would not, if possessed of but one lingering remnant of common sense, enter into any compact for the support of a system with which England has nothing to do, and which is as unnatural in itself as it is odious, galling, and intolerable to those who are its victims. The Lombardo-Venetians are not, and never will be, reconciled to the dominion of Austria. In vain the Emperor may seek to gain their good will; in vain he may issue his amnesties to the nobles; in vain, if they remain disaffected, he may threaten, as he did but the other day, to let loose the mob and the canaille upon them, to commit horrors and atrocities equal to those which, at his instigation, were committed, for similar reasons, upon the murdered nobles of Galicia. The Italians will only submit while resistance is impossible. They look with hope to the future to free them from an oppression which all the world admits to be cruel, but which they feel to be both cruel and humiliating. To guarantee to Austria the possession of those provinces would be to guarantee the perpetuity of tyranny and misrule, not only in the north of Italy, but in the Two Sicilies, in the Papal States, and throughout every part of the Peninsula, except in Piedmont. It is the misfortune of the house of Hapsburg to be lords of Italy, and to be unable with safety either to retain or to forego possession. But Austria must pay the penalty of her position. All that she can ask of Great Britain, however closely she may be allied with us, is to hold aloof. There was a time when a chance offered of removing the difficulty. Whether it were the fault of Austria or of Great Britain that advantage was not taken of it is known but to few; but as the project would have involved the humiliation of Russia, for whom, even at the height and fury of the late war, our statesmen of all parties had an unaccountable and most mysterious tenderness, it is probable that this country was not wholly guiltless of having allowed the opportunity to slip away unheeded. To have given Austria the mouths of the Danube in exchange for North Italy, and to have compensated the Sultan at the expense of Russia, would have been an arrangement beneficial to Europe; but, partly by the cowardice and timidity of Austria herself, and partly by the determination of Englishmen, high in power and in office, to "put out" the war and save Russia from dismemberment, the golden hour was lost. It is not likely that it will ever again return; and Austria must bear the burden and the penalty of retaining Lombardy and Venice in defiance of the prejudices, the interests, the passions, and the reason of a noble, though unhappy, people. The free white men of the United States of America could scarcely look with more disgust and abhorrence on subjection to an overwhelming force of negroes than the Italians look upon their forced subjection to the Germans. It is not a relationship of citizen to citizen, but of conqueror to the conquered, and of the master to the slave; with the additional bitterness that the conquered knows himself to be the better and the nobler of the two. When the day comes for the inevitable struggle, if Mr Disraeli be still in existence, let us hope that he will have as much sympathy for the Italians as he expresses now, and that if he should happen to be in office he will give neither sympathy nor support to the oppressors of Italy.

SHOULD circumstances bring about within any reasonable time the restoration to power of the Earl of Derby and Mr. Disraeli, it is clear, from what took place in the Commons on Tuesday night, that the future Chancellor of the Exchequer of the party is not to be Mr. Disraeli, but Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Disraeli aspires to the post so long and so ably occupied by Lord Palmerston, and at present so worthily filled by the Earl of Clarendon; and will not again consent to discharge the useful and laborious functions of Financial Minister. These functions allow of no exercise of the romantic faculty which Lord Palmerston so justly concedes to him, and demand a greater and stricter appreciation of dry facts than seems to his present taste. Mr. Disraeli, having resolved to fight the battle of his party on the question of the Property and Income Tax, and to designate Mr. Gladstone as his Chancellor of the Exchequer Elect, has placed two resolutions on the paper, which are to be discussed on the 17th instant. The first is to express the opinion of the House that the taxes which have been granted in a time of war for the purpose of carrying on the war should not be levied in a period of profound peace. The second is to the effect that the House should express its opinion that the settlement of 1853, proposed by the right hon. gentleman the member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), should be adhered to.

It would have been better if Mr. Disraeli had waited to hear the intentions of the actual holder of the seals of the Exchequer before bringing forward his resolutions; but it is at all events an advantage to know in the mean time whether the small but compact party called the Peelites are to stand between the Government and the Opposition, inclining to neither, or whether they have made up their minds to coalesce with either the one or the other. Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone have lost no time in letting the country know how the matter stands; and we may gather from Mr. Disraeli's resolutions, no less than from Mr. Gladstone's speech, that the Peelites are about to lose their distinctive character, and to merge into that great and respectable Conservative party from which they sprung. It is a simplification very much to be desired; and will give Mr. Gladstone and his friends a far better chance of a future career of public usefulness than they could have hoped to obtain in the sulky and impracticable isolation to which, since the late war showed their incapacity to rise to the height of a great occasion, they seemed bent upon dooming themselves. As a peace financier Mr. Gladstone will be highly commended by all who remember the excellent Budget which he presented in 1853; as a war financier he made a palpable failure, and inflicted upon his reputation a damage from which it has not yet recovered. But it has to be shown that the financial circumstances of 1857 are similar to the financial circumstances of 1853 before Parliament will agree in the later year to a Budget that was sufficient for the earlier one. We will not deny that Mr. Gladstone's arrangement of the Property and Income Tax is per se to be infinitely preferred to that of Sir G. C. Lewis. To pay sevenpence in the pound is less irksome than to pay sixteenpence, especially when the sevenpence promises to reduce itself to fivepence, and to evanish altogether in a year or two. But in such matters as these the cart cannot be placed before the horse. The country must hear what the actual Chancellor of the Exchequer has to say or do about the war ninepence, and the evanishing sevenpence, and be enabled to see his Budget as a whole before it can listen to the clever but impatient ex-Chancellors, who have laid their heads together to impede the public business. The world is interested in the coalition which they have formed and divulged; but it is not at present interested in any financial schemes which they may have elaborated to show their own dexterity.

THE COURT.

The Royal hospitalities of Windsor Castle have been continued during the week, and on Thursday the guests were entertained by a grand theatrical representation of Shakspeare's "Richard III." in St. George's Hall.

On Sunday the Queen and the Prince, the elder portion of the Royal family, the Duchess of Kent, the Princess of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, and Prince Adolphus of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfurst, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon and Very Rev the Dean of Windsor performed the service, and administered the Holy Sacrament.

On Monday the Queen held a Privy Council, at which the Royal Speech on the opening of Parliament was approved of by her Majesty. At the Council the Queen appointed the sheriffs for the various counties of England and Wales for the present year. The Duke of Newcastle having been appointed Lord Lieutenant of the county of Nottingham, his Grace was sworn in to that office, and Sir Alexander Cockburn, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, was sworn of her Majesty's Privy Council, and took his place at the Board. Viscount Castlereagh kissed hands on his appointment as Comptroller of the Royal Household. In the evening their Serene Highnesses the Princess of Hohenlohe-Langenburg and Princess Feodore dined with her Majesty.

On Tuesday the Queen walked in the grounds adjoining the Castle. His Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Prince of Wales skated on the ice in the Home Park. The Princess Victoria Gaudonna of Coorg and Mrs Drummond, and Rear-Admiral Sir Houston Stewart, arrived on a visit.

On Wednesday the Queen walked in the Castle grounds, while Prince Albert and the Prince of Wales enjoyed the diversion of skating. Earl Spencer, Lord Steward of the Household had an audience of her Majesty, to present the Address from the House of Lords in answer to the Speech from the Throne.

On Thursday a large accession of visitors arrived at the Castle.

The Duchess of Wellington has succeeded the Countess of Desart as Lady in Waiting to her Majesty. Major-General the Hon. C. Grey and Lieutenant-Colonel Ponsonby have succeeded Major-General Buckley and Colonel F. H. Seymour as Equerries in Waiting to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

The Countess Granville "received" on Monday evening, after a Parliamentary banquet given by the noble Earl to a large party of Ministerial Peers. The Premier gave a grand dinner on the same evening to a party of Liberal members of the House of Commons chiefly attached to the Government. The Earl of Derby and Mr. Disraeli respectively entertained large parties of their political followers on the same evening.

The marriage of the Countess Mathilde Kielmansegge with Lord Arthur Hay will take place on the 17th instant.

The Bishop of Peterborough has issued cards for assemblies on [illegible] during the present month.

The marriage of Lord Alfred Churchill with the Hon Miss Calthorpe took place on Thursday at St George's Chapel, Hanover Square.

THE Rev. Samuel Gilbert Brent, M.A., Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, has been appointed by Mr. Cowper, who has been elected President of the Board of Health by the Metropolis, to be Secretary of the Ordnance.

THE PRESENT NUMBER OF THE "ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS."

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

THE accompanying Portrait of her Most Gracious Majesty has been copied from a picture, painted in pastel by Mr. Alexander Blaikley, of the Review of the Guards in Hyde-park, in July last, on their return from the Crimea; this being the latest occasion of her Majesty's appearance in public. The characteristic frame has been designed by T. R. Macquoid.

Alexandrina Victoria, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, is the only daughter and heir of the late Prince Edward, Duke of Kent, fourth son of King George III., and of Victoria Maria Louisa (Princess Dowager of Leiningen). Duchess of Kent, and sister of the King of the Belgians. Her Majesty was born at Kensington Palace, on the 24th of May, 1819; baptised on the 24th of June, 1819; ascended the throne on the demise of her uncle, King William IV., 20th of June, 1837; and was crowned at Westminster, on the 28th of June, 1838.

Her Majesty was married at St. James's Palace, on the 10th of February, 1840, to Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, born August 26, 1819. Her Majesty has had issue: Victoria Adelaide Mary Louisa, born Nov. 21, 1840 (Princess Royal); Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, born Nov. 9, 1841; Alice Maud Mary, born April 25, 1843; Alfred Ernest Albert, born August 6, 1844; Helena Augusta Victoria, born May 25, 1846; Louisa Caroline Alberta, born March 18, 1848; Arthur William Patrick Albert, born May 1, 1850; Leopold George Duncan Albert, born April 7, 1853. These several children were born at Buckingham Palace, with the exception of the Prince of Wales, whose birth and baptism took place at Windsor Castle.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

THE RIGHT HON. ROBERT MONSEY ROLFE, LORD CRANWORTH, LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR OF GREAT BRITAIN—whose Portrait we this day present to our subscribers—is one of the few instances of a law officer of the Crown having passed through every grade of the judicial office before he attained his present rank. Attorney-Generals or Solicitor-Generals are more in the habit of leaping per saltum from the Bar to the offices of Chief Justice or Chancellor. His Lordship is the eldest son of the Rev. Edmund Rolfe, of Cranworth, Norfolk, by the daughter of William Alexander, brother of the Earl of Caledon. He boasts also the blood of Nelson in his veins, his grandfather having married a niece of the famous Admiral.

Lord Cranworth was born in 1790, and was educated at a school at Bury St. Edmunds, and afterwards at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1812 he graduated B.A., and was elected a Fellow of Downing College. He took his degree of M.A. in 1815, and in 1816 was called to the Bar at Lincoln's-inn. In 1832 he was made a Queen's Counsel; and in the same year was elected as the representative of Penryn in Parliament. During his career at the bar he was well known in the profession as a sound lawyer and a painstaking advocate. But it is not denied that his position did not, in the eyes of his contemporaries, quite justify his elevation to the office of Solicitor-General by Lord Melbourne's Government in 1834; and there were not wanting persons who attributed his promotion more to his having a safe seat for Penryn than to his professional standing. He occupied that office until 1839, when, with a modesty not too characteristic of Solicitor-Generals, he accepted the office of a Baron of the Court of Exchequer; singularly enough, on the death of Mr. Baron Garrow, who had set an example of humility in law officers of the Crown by accepting a Puisne Judgeship at a time that he held the post of Attorney-General. It was intended that Mr. Baron Rolfe should chiefly be occupied in the business of the equity side of the Court of Exchequer, for which his antecedents qualified him, but the abolition of that branch of the Court in a short time afterwards placed him entirely in the position of a Common Law Judge; and it is mere justice to him to state that in a very brief period he acquired a reputation which enabled him to hold his own by the side of such Judges as Parke and Alderson. His readiness in the trial of causes and prisoners at first caused some surprise, until it was recollected that he had for many years sat judicially as Recorder of Norwich, and so obtained that insight into the mode of dealing with evidence and juries which is not commonly an advantage possessed by members of the Chancery bar. On the retirement of Lord Cottenham in 1850 from the Chancellorship, Mr. Baron Rolfe was appointed a Commissioner of the Great Seal, and sat for a few weeks in that capacity in conjunction with the late Lord Langdale, then Master of the Rolls.

On the retirement of Sir James Wigram, in the same year, he was removed from the Exchequer to the Court of Chancery, and appointed a Vice Chancellor. Shortly afterwards he was raised to the Peerage by the title of Baron Cranworth. In the following year, the new Court of Appeal in Chancery being constituted, Lord Cranworth was appointed one of the Lord Justices; having Sir J. Knight Bruce as his colleague. The sphere of his labours was still further enlarged in the year 1852, when he was chosen to be the Chancellor of the Coalition Ministry of Lord Aberdeen; and on the reconstruction of the Government in February, 1855 he retained his office under Lord Palmerston. As a Judge Lord Cranworth has always exhibited sterling qualities. With an adequate professional knowledge he unites plain good sense, an evident desire to do justice, an admirably-regulated temper, and the most indomitable patience and industry. At the same time he is not wanting in firmness and self-reliance, qualities which have been found not unnecessary in his association with more than one member both of the Bench and the Bar, in the Courts of Law and in the House of Lords. His decisions when sitting alone in Equity as a Judge of Appeal have generally given satisfaction; and indeed it has been sometimes urged that the Court of the Chancellor was on the whole a safer one than that of the other branch of the Court of Appeal.

As Speaker of the House of Lords the Chancellor's duties are comparatively light, their Lordships by usage exercising a kind of republican jurisdiction over their own proceedings. As a debater Lord Cranworth is more ready and more fluent than either Lord Cottenham or Lord St. Leonards; but the distance between his oratory and that of Lord Lyndhurst, is sufficiently wide. The Chancellor is rather small in person, but he is still exceedingly active, and his industry and assiduity show no symptom of abatement. It has, however, been more than once rumoured that he has expressed a wish to retire from the woolsack in office, but those reports have been generally coeval with his comparative failures as a law reformer, and may, therefore, be traceable to some connection with that subject. His Lordship married, in 1845, Laura, the daughter of T. W. Carr, Esq.; but has no issue.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THE RIGHT HON. CHARLES SHAW LEFEVRE—whose likeness in three [illegible] will at once be recognised by all who have had the pleasure of seeing him—has occupied the chair of the House of Commons since 1839, when, on the retirement of Mr. Abercromby, he was elected Speaker by 317 votes to 200—his opponent being the late Mr. Goulburn. Mr. Shaw Lefevre was born in 1794: he is the eldest son of Mr. Shaw Lefevre, who was a member of the House of Commons for twenty-six years. The right hon. gentleman was educated at Winchester, and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1819, and was called to the Bar in the same year. Before the Reform Bill he sat for the borough of Downton, and afterwards for Hampshire; and in 1832 was returned for North Hampshire, [illegible] county he was [illegible] without opposition at the years 1837, 1841, 1847, and 1852. He has always been [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENT met on Tuesday, and for the first time the thunder-tones of the "Warner" (as the great bell ought, in justice to its founder, to be called) were heard at a ceremonial appertaining to the edifice to which the bell itself belongs. The Queen's Speech was read by the Lord Chancellor. The debate on the Address brought out the leading men of each party. Mr. Gladstone, in a clever speech, indicated his intention of co-operating in certain points with his old friends the Conservatives. Mr. Disraeli made a long and vituperative attack upon the foreign policy of the Cabinet, to which we refer here chiefly in order to note that he distinctly declared that he "had seen" the treaty by which France guaranteed to Austria her Italian dominions. Lord Palmerston's reply was, "Then I have not." The words are not given by the metropolitan reporters, but appear in the Manchester Times. The fact is worth note, because the Premier replied to Mr. Disraeli with a certain superior manner, which, were not Lord Palmerston the incarnation of good nature, one might call insolence, and treated the whole story of the treaty as a canard. Mr. Disraeli says that he has seen it. In the Lords there was a division on the Address, Lord Grey offering an unconcerted opposition, and obtaining a small minority. In the Commons the Address was unanimously agreed to; but motions, hostile to several of its postulates, were set down for speedy battle.

The severe weather which has recently set in is occasioning great distress among the humbler classes, especially among the labourers whose work is suspended by frost. In some parts of London they are parading the streets, singing dismal appeals to charity, and they are also applying in great numbers to the workhouses. Much relief is thus given, but the applicants are not in all cases willing to submit to the work required of them before they receive succour. Some of this resistance is no doubt offered by idlers, who would eat without working; but in other cases it is made by men who have been accustomed to work requiring sensitiveness of hand, and who find the stone-breaking hammer destroy the very quality essential to their obtaining employment hereafter. It is lamentable to see a skilled artisan sit down to a heap of stones, and it is to be wished that some other form of test could be devised. The general cry among these men is for help to emigrate, and it is a cry which ought not to be disregarded. In the mean time private charity is making exertions for the unfortunate; and we would earnestly counsel those who can give money, but not time, to confide their liberality to the judicious administration of "the sitting magistrates." In no quarter will it be more surely dispensed to the deserving, and withheld from the professional mendicant.

Verger's head has fallen; and the sentence was well deserved. But his example has been followed, and an attempt has been made to murder the Archbishop of Madera—a Canon who sought to save his chief being shot dead. The mode in which the French assassin was convicted has occasioned great indignation, even in those who could not conditionally have held out a finger to save his life. The Church had sufficient indulgence to procure the suppression of testimony which Verger desired, and had a right to call. It was understood that the revelations which he would have elicited as to the vicious lives of clerical personages would have brought so much scandal upon the Church—not, just now, in the best odour with society—that it was desirable, at any price of injustice, to prevent so damaging an examination. Morally gagged, therefore, Verger went to the guillotine. He seems to have had a great terror of death; and this may be taken as further evidence that his insanity had ample "method" in it.

All the details of the capture of Bushire show that the Indian army understands its business. All its arrangements were complete, and, when the time came for the rush upon the place, every part of the assailing force knew its duty, and did it. Our own men and the Sepoys vied with each other in bravery, and no military operation was ever conducted with more skill and valour in union. The proof is in the speedy reduction of Bushire, with a very slight loss to the attackers and a very heavy one to the defenders. The feat was performed by Indian officers; and we do not learn that any of them quarrelled and abused each other to the Commander, or that any one of them neglected his men and remained on board one of the expeditionary ships, that theso officers were exposed to unnecessary hardships, or that proper food and ammunition were not supplied to them. But then the leaders were only "Indian officers," and had not been trained under a system. Sir John M'Neil and Colonel Tulloch, who, by the way, reiterate all the charges in their Crimean Report, and tear the ridiculous business at Chelsea to tatters, would have had no complaint to make of the way Indian campaigners go to work.

A deputation on the paper duties has waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and has brought before him the case for the abolition, in a forcible manner, with viva voce testimony in its favour. Sir G. C. Lewis admitted that some very strong facts had been brought to his notice, and that the subject should receive full consideration; but he gave the intimation which, of course, was expected, that this was not a favourable time for remitting duties. The matter must, however, be kept constantly before the eyes of all Chancellors of the Exchequer until the emancipation of what has been called by an American representative (who imagined that he was contemptuous) mere Rags and Lamplack has been obtained. The matrimony of rags and lamplack has produced more good to mankind than any event on uninspired record; and what Providence has joined let not Chancellors of Exchequer seek to put asunder.

The Church Parliament has been sitting and discharging its ineffectual speeches. Several Bishops alluded to the embarrassment in which a clergyman is placed when, reading the burial service over some person whom he knew to have been wicked and worthless, he is called upon to express his "sure and certain hope" of that person's "joyful resurrection." Their Lordships agreed that the position of the clergyman was painful; but thought that it was better to endure this occasional evil than to tamper with the service. The Bishop of Exeter declared that nothing should induce him to utter the hope in question under such circumstances; but added that he could not advise any other clergyman to violate the law. Another intimation was given by one of their Lordships, namely—that if a clergyman knew of a person living in sin it was his duty to rebuke him while alive, and if he could not reform him, to get him excommunicated, and then the burial service would not be read over him. One can scarcely believe that a Bishop could be in earnest in giving such advice to a parish priest. It reads like Baron Maule's sarcastic address to the convicted bigamist pauper, who ought to have gone to the Ecclesiastical Court and the House of Lords for a divorce.

THE "CODEX ARGENTEUS."—Professor Uppström, from the University of Upsala, communicates to the world of letters the interesting fact that the two leaves of the "Codex Argenteus" of Ulfilas, the loss of which was first discovered in 1834, have been found again. The "Codex" comprises once more 187 leaves: the same number which it contained when Count Magnus Gabriel de la Gardie presented it to the Library of the University of Upsala. The leaves now lost were taken in 1648, to 1649, but they were lost before 1648, when the "Codex" became Swedish property.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

VISCOUNT DOWNE.

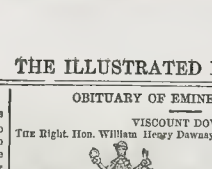
THE Right Hon. William Henry Dawnay, seventh Viscount Downe in the Peerage of Ireland, and a Baronet of England who died on the 26th ult., at Torquay, where he had gone for the benefit of his health—was the eldest son of the Rev. William Henry, the sixth Viscount, by his wife Lydia, only daughter of the late John Heathcote, Esq., of Conington Castle, Huntingdonshire. He was born the 15th May, 1812, and married, the 26th July, 1843, Mary Isabel, fourth daughter of the late Hon. and Right Rev. Dr Bagot, Bishop of Bath and Wells, by whom he leaves issue a youthful family of seven sons and a daughter. Lord Downe was educated at Christ-church, Oxford, where he graduated as B.A. in 1833, and as M.A. in 1837. In 1841 he was elected M.P. for Rutlandshire in 1841, and continued to retain his seat in the Commons up to January, 1846; he succeeded to the family honours on the demise of his father, in the May of that year. Lord Downe was a Deputy Lieutenant of York-shire, and was for some years an officer in the Yorkshire Hussars. He is succeeded by his eldest son, the Hon. Hugh Richard Dawnay, now the eighth Viscount, who is in his thirteenth year.



The very ancient family of Dawnay, Viscounts Downe, springs from Sir Payn D'Aunay, of Aunay Castle, in Normandy, who came to England with the Conqueror. Sir William Dawnay, a descendant, Sir William Dawnay, was made a General, at Acon, by Richard I. He had there displayed his prowess by slaying a Saracen, and by killing a lion, the paw of which he presented to the warrior monarch, who, to commemorate these valiant deeds, gave him a ring to this day in the possession of the family, and ordered that he should bear for crest a demi-Saracen, with a lion's paw in one hand and a ring in the other. The first of the Dawneys who was made a Baronet was Christopher Dawnay, of Cowick, a staunch Cavalier He received his patent from Charles I. in 1642. His son, Sir John Dawnay, also a warm adherent of the Stuarts, was the first Viscount, being created the 19th Feb., 1680. He sat in King James's Irish Parliament in 1689

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL THORN.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR FREDERICK THORN, K.C.B., K.H., Colonel of the 3rd Buffs, had been more than fifty years in the British service. He entered the Army in 1802, went in 1808 with the Buffs to the Peninsula, and shared in most of the great engagements from that time to 1814. He was at Busaco, Badajoz, Albuera, Talavera, Vittoria, the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, Orthez, and Toulouse, besides the minor affairs of Arroyo de Molino, Almarez, Garris, and Aire. During the greater portion of the time General Thorn was employed as Assistant Quartermaster-General, and in a similar capacity he embarked at Bordeaux in 1814 for America, when he was present at the affair at Plattsburg. He was once wounded, and had three horses shot under him. For his arduous services Thorn was made a K H in 1833 and a C.B.; he became a Lieutenant-General and obtained the Colonelcy of the 3rd Buffs in 1844, and it was only the other day that he was advanced to be a Knight Commander of the Bath. He had, in fact, just returned from his investiture at Windsor Castle, when on reaching his residence, near Taunton, he was taken suddenly ill, and died the next day, the 28th ult.

REAR-ADMIRAL MILWARD.

REAR-ADMIRAL CLEMENT MILWARD entered the Navy 20th Oct., 1793, on board the Alarm (28), under Lewis Robertson; and in the following years was severely wounded while Midshipman of that frigate in an attack at Point à Pitre, Guadaloupe. After two years' further service on the West India station he left the Alarm in August, 1796, for the Prince of Wales, flag-ship of Rear-Admiral Henry Harvey, under whom, on February, 1797, he witnessed the surrender of Trinidad. In October of the latter year Milward became Acting Lieutenant of the Favourite sloop, Captain Lord Camelford. While in that capacity it was he who handed Lord Camelford the pistol on the well-known occasion when Lord Camelford shot Lieutenant Peterson. His Majesty King Wm. IV. took for gentlemanly conduct at English Harbour, Antigua. In August, 1799, being then again in the Prince of Wales, under Lord High Sydney, he assisted as Midshipman at the capture of Curaçoa. On that occasion he received more than one wound. He was afterwards promoted, and appointed to the Serpent, a prize corvette of 20 guns. He came home invalided from the West Indies in October, 1801, and in 1802 was then a Lieutenant of native service again. On the 2nd August, 1805, he participated, when in company with the Harrier sloop, in an action of two hours with the French 3-gun brig-sloop Curieuse, of 18 guns and 120 men, at the entrance of the Straits of St Bonifacio. Previous to this he was at the reducing of Martinique and on his return to England in the Belleisle with Admiral Cochrane, and again was on the latter's staff when he was promoted with a Commander's commission on the 10th June, 1809. As Captain of the Herald, in 1815, he succeeded in capturing the corvette of the enemy's vessels, and took part in the expedition against New Orleans. Captain Milward accepted the rank of Retired Rear-Admiral, 1st October, 1846; and died at his residence at Tullaghis, in the county Kilkenny, on the 14th ult., in the eighty-first year of his age.

REAR-ADMIRAL STEVENSON.

THE demise of Retired Rear-Admiral James Stevenson occurred recently at Leith. This officer entered the Navy in 1793, as a first-class volunteer. He served [illegible] of South America, until 1797, and in the Channel and West [illegible] 1802. In 1805 he was nominated Acting Lieutenant [illegible] Leda, 36, and was stationed at the blockade of Martinique. He [illegible] England in 1811, obtained, in 1834, an appointment [illegible] at Carnbee at Dundee; acquired the rank of Commander in 1838, and [illegible] 1841 post commission, bearing date 1837. He was employed with the exception of an interval of two months in the summer of 1840 on various parts of the Baltic, Mediterranean, and Home stations. He many years of two private ships and accompanied the expeditions to Copenhagen and Walcheren. He attained his present rank in 1846.

MR. EDWARD FRANCIS FITZWILLIAM.

THIS talented young composer died on the 19th ult., at his residence at Brompton, in his thirty-third year. He was the son of Mr. Fitzwilliam, at one time a very popular comedian. His mother was the late famous actress and vocalist, Mrs. Fitzwilliam, who was born at Deal, in Kent, the 2nd August, 1821; was educated at the Pimlico Grammar School; afterwards at St Edmund's College, Old Hall, Herts; and finally at the Jesuit college [illegible] the Abbé Haffreingues at Boulogne. On quitting that college he was instructed in music by the celebrated composer Henry Bishop and John Barnett, and soon obtained reputation as a composer himself. In 1847 he was made musical director of the Lyceum, and in 1853 he was appointed to the same office at the Haymarket Theatre and retained it till his death. His principal compositions were a "Solemn Mass" and a "Te Deum," and a host of songs in lighter style such as "Rose and Thistle," "Bonnie Dundee," and "Bonnie Prince Charlie," and "The Flowers of the Forest." Mr. Fitzwilliam married, the 31st Dec., 1851, the clever actress, Miss Ellen Chaplin, whom he has left with an infant son to lament his loss.

EXECUTION OF VERGER.—The assassin of the late Archbishop of Paris underwent the punishment of his crime on the morning of the 30th ult., in front of the prison La Roquette. His appeal having been rejected, as well as his application for pardon, the order was given for his execution. It arrived at the prison at half-past twelve on the previous night, being brought by the executioner himself. At two o'clock the scaffold had been erected. Notwithstanding the silence which had been observed as to the time, and the late hour at which the preparations were commenced, an immense crowd, including many women, had collected before day broke in the broad streets. As early as five o'clock carriages arrived filled with persons anxious to obtain places; and by seven o'clock the Place de la Roquette and the neighbouring streets were thronged. After a few minutes before eight the prisoner was led out to undergo his doom. When taking leave of the director of the prison he again requested him to grant him an hour. He then became so weak as he crossed the threshold of the prison that he was obliged to be supported on one side by the Abbé Hugon and on the other by the executioner, and the moment after found himself before the instrument of death. During his progress from the prison he was heard to utter several times, such as amende honorable, plus tard, and then ascended the steps, still upheld by the Abbé and the executioner. On reaching the platform Verger fell on his knees and uttered some words, apparently mental prayer, and immediately after rose and kissed the crucifix, and at last, as if by one terrible effort, threw himself into the hands of the executioner. In a moment after his career in this world had terminated.

ERRATUM AT PAGE 99.—The name of the American poet quoted and illustrated is George H., not Charles, Boker; and the title of the volume is "The Podesta's Daughter." (Dell and Trumbo, Philadelphia.)

In the course of the next spring a very important library, containing 20,000 volumes, will be brought to the market in Göttingen. It was formerly the property of the late Captain Wrisberg, and consists mainly of the library of the former Professor of Anatomy, Herr Wrisberg.

LITTLE FOOTPRINTS IN THE SNOW.

Oh, little footprints in the snow!
Down the garden path they go,
Children all.
Jessie the eldest, slim and tall,
Valorous Dick,
Armed with his stick,
And soft-eyed Mary,
Quiet, demure,
Pale and pure;
And our youngest fairy,
Baby Alice, our birdie small.
She can just walk,
And lisping, talk;
She points with her tiny shell-pink finger
To the elfin rime
Or the bare-branched lime,
Where the frosts of the early morning linger;—
Grave surprise
In the baby eyes
As she looks on the winter world, a white
New wonder to our wee thing's sight,
So, laughing merrily and childish clear
Into the tingling, shining, frosty air,
Fair as dear,
Dear as fair,
Trip they—a bright-faced band,
Hand in hand,
And down the garden path they go,
Leaving little footprints in the snow.

The ranges of temperature during the week were 18°2.

Snow was falling at 6 p.m. of Jan. 30, and a heavy fall took place on the early morning of the 31st. It was again snowing at 11 a.m. of Feb. 2, and on the night of Feb. 3; a few flakes likewise fell on the evening of Feb 2 and the morning of Feb 4. Thaw was going on during the day of the 31st, and on Feb 1 and 2, but the ground still remains covered with snow.

Dense fog prevailed during the day and night of Feb. 1. A halo was visible round the moon on the night of Feb 2.

The sky has been much overcast, but was clear on the days of Jan 29 and Feb. 3, and nights of Jan. 31 and Feb 3. A little rain fell at midnight of Jan. 30.

The daily means are obtained from observations made at 6h. and 18h. and at 9h. and 21h. p.m. on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The more exact formulæ for these operations are taken from the Tables of Mr. Glashier. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's formulæ and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The movement of the wind is given by a self-recording Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

SIXTY-SEVEN convicts from the Defence hulk were forwarded on Friday to the convict prison at Dartmoor, and on the same day twenty-six convicts from Millbank prison arrived at the Royal Arsenal, to be sent on board the Defence.

A MEETING of Commissioners of Lieutenancy was held on the 30th ult., at Guildhall, for the purpose of making arrangements for calling out the militia. The Colonel reported several vacancies for Lieutenants and Ensigns. A special court was appointed to be held on Friday, the 13th inst., to receive applications from candidates for the vacant commissions.

THE three regiments of the line quartered at Portsmouth are being removed. The 97th Regiment has been replaced by the 30th. The 20th and 32nd will be replaced by the 23rd Royal Welsh Fusiliers and the 82nd Regiment. The changes are between Portsmouth and the camp at Aldershott. The 23rd, 82nd, and 30th are not to remain long at Portsmouth; according to present arrangements they go to the East Indies as soon as the transports to convey them there are ready.

IT was reported lately that the system of job and task work in her Majesty's dockyards was to be discontinued, and that the ordinary day pay, which was suspended during the war, was to be resumed. This order will take effect on the 1st of April, the shipwrights receiving an additional 6d. per day to the original 5s. pay of that class of artisans, and joiners, painters, coopers, and wheelwrights, an addition of 4d per day. This will be very satisfactory to all the men concerned, inasmuch as, under the task and job work system, they have realised some 8s or 9s. per day, while the intended increase in daily pay will not give any of them more than 6s per day. The other branches, the smiths, millwrights, sailmakers, ropemakers, and sawyers, are not to receive any addition to their standard daily pay. In consequence of these alterations, and the increasing of the pay of some classes of artisans, a memorial has been drawn up by those who left themselves open for a fresh presentation to the Admiralty. In addition to the above reductions of expenditure, it is ordered that the number of hired men in her Majesty's dockyards are to be discharged on the 31st of March, and that the wages of all labourers are to be reduced from 16s. to 12s. per week.

REAR-ADMIRAL PETER RICHARDS, who has long been one of the most efficient Lords of the Admiralty, has been appointed Commissioner of Greenwich Hospital. Admiral Richards was First Lieutenant of the Queen Charlotte at Algiers, and has won his way to his present high station solely by his unwearied assiduity and his steadiest honesty of purpose.

THE arrangements connected with the organisation of the War-office are now completed, and the offices of Clerk of the Ordnance, Deputy Secretary-at-War, and Director-General of Army Clothing have been abolished. Colonel Mundy has been appointed Governor of Jersey, and Sir Benjamin Hawes, the late Deputy Secretary-at-War, becomes the permanent Under Secretary of State. Mr Godley, the late Director-General of Stores, is appointed Assistant Under Secretary of State; Sir Henry Storks, K.C.B., is appointed Secretary for Military Correspondence; Captain Collin, at present Naval Director General of Artillery, is appointed Director of Stores and Clothing. He will be attached to the former office being brought into the public. Mr. Rainsford, who has hitherto been Assistant Paymaster-General of Clothing, will be Assistant Director of Stores and Clothing, and will, in consequence of the amalgamation, undertake other duties connected with army stores generally in addition to those hitherto performed by him. Sir Thomas Ironbridge is appointed Deputy Adjutant-General at Cork, and will under the directions of his Royal Highness the General Commanding-in-Chief, perform the multifarious duties connected with the [illegible] of all patterns of clothing, accoutrements, and necessaries. Mr. Godley, Captain Collin, and those purely military duties formerly undertaken by the Board of General Officers.

MEMORIAL OF THE LATE WAR.—A very interesting model of the British Cemetery on Cathcart's Hill, Sebastopol, has been presented to the Museum of the United Service Institution, by Mr. C. L. Curtis. This model has been constructed from authentic plans and elevations drawn by officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers. It shows the cemetery in June, 1856, with the several graves, tombs, and headstones; and Mr Curtis has caused to be engraved a key to the memorials, with the several inscriptions.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

PUBLIC BUSINESS. Mr. OLIVEIRA took charge of the private business of the House, and discharged the functions in that department formerly discharged by Mr. Brotherton. Several petitions were presented against the Income-tax

THE REPORT ON THE ADDRESS.

Mr. JOHN RAMSDEN brought up the report on the Address.

Mr. HADFIELD complained that there was no allusion in the Speech to the condition of India. The people there were in great distress, while the cultivation of cotton, which they could supply to any extent, was neglected. He charged the Government with not doing their duty in that respect, and reminded them of the frightful results which would happen if the supplies of cotton from America were stopped, a result which might happen on any day

Mr. WALCOTT called attention to the gallantry which the Indian [illegible] shown in the Persian expedition; at the same time that he lamented none of the Queen's ships had been employed in the expedition. With respect to the Chinese expedition, he thought the retribution inflicted upon the Chinese was too severe, but he believed it was not beyond the instructions issued from home.

Sir J. FITZGERALD reiterated the complaints of Mr. Hadfield with respect to the neglect of Indian agriculture.

Mr. V. SMITH admitted the importance of the question. The matter was under the consideration of the Government, and he did not despair of affording greater facilities to the cultivation of cotton by changing the rent-charge upon the land, which at present varied from year to year, into a permanent charge.

After some remarks from Mr. Kinnaird, the report was brought up and agreed to.

Mr. CRALFURD obtained leave to bring in a bill to render judgments or decrees obtained in any court in the United Kingdom valid in all other parts of the kingdom. The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

CHINA AND PERSIA.—The Earl of CLARENDON, in answer to a series of questions put to him by the Earl of Ellenborough, the Earl of Derby, and the Earl of Malmesbury, stated that the papers relating to the recent proceedings in Canton, including a map of that city, were now ready for presentation to their Lordships' House. The papers relating to the war with Persia were only delayed pending the negotiations that were now going on in Paris between the Persian Ambassador and Lord Cowley. The only instructions given to Sir John Bowring were those he received upon leaving this country for Canton, and had no special reference to the circumstances which had recently occurred. The Earl of Carlisle thought it would be desirable to have produced copies of the despatches that had been received and forwarded in reference to the affairs of China, from the date of the last treaty entered into with that Power

The Earl of CARLISLE, in asking a question of the Secretary of State for War, resating to the Army, took the opportunity of referring to a personal attack made upon him by a junior officer under cover of an anonymous publication. Lord PANMURE, while deprecating the practice of making that House a Court of Appeal in respect to points of discipline in the Army, thought that, considering the distinguished services of the noble Lord during the late war, for which he had received the special thanks of the late Lord Raglan, and the thanks of that House, the noble Earl could very well afford to allow those attacks to which he had referred to pass unnoticed.

Lord BERNERS moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty for a return of the number of tickets of leave issued to convicts in each year since the commencement of such practice; their original sentence, and unexpired time, showing the number of such convicts reappreheaded, for what offence, and the result of such apprehension.—Lord GRANVILLE, on the part of the Government, assented to the motion, and hoped there would be no discussion on the subject on that occasion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

NEW WRIT. On the motion of Mr. HAYTER, a new writ was ordered for Hull, in the room of Sir H. W. Watson, recently created a Baron of the Exchequer

A vast number of petitions were presented for the entire or partial repeal of the Income-tax

MAYNOOTH GRANT.—Mr. SPOONER gave notice that he would, on that day fortnight, move that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the subject of the College of Maynooth (Laughter).

PORTUGUESE DRUGS. Sir G. GREY, in reply to Mr Brady, said he intended shortly to introduce a bill to regulate the sale of poisonous drugs.

HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY

Mr. LABOUCHERE moved the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the state of the British Possessions in North America which are under the administration of the Hudson's Bay Company, or over which they possess a license to trade

Mr. ADDERLEY did not mean to oppose the motion, but suggested that its object might be attained by a shorter course. The question was one of territories was colonisation, to which the Hudson's Bay Company was entirely opposed. The United States now were bent upon extension and aggrandisement. If they succeeded in their projects they would be able to domineer over the world, and the aim of the Government of this country ought to be to create in their American territories a balance to the power of the States.

Mr. ADDERLEY supported the motion.

Mr. SAMUEL JONES, junior, defended the conduct of the Hudson's Bay Company, but without opposing the motion.

Mr. GLADSTONE contended that the Hudson's Bay Company had no valid claim to the possession of its exclusive privileges; and that it was alike unjust and inexpedient to place such vast territories under the sole control of a commercial polity.

After some remarks from Mr. Henley, Mr. Laing, Mr. H. Baillie, and Mr. Labouchere, in explanation,

The motion was agreed to.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS. Mr. LABOUCHERE obtained leave to bring in a bill to enable the inhabitants of the Ionian Islands to hold naval and military commissions under the Crown.

NORFOLK ISLAND.—Mr. LABOUCHERE also obtained leave to bring in a bill to alter the existing provisions relating to ecclesiastical government in Norfolk Island.

Mr. A. PELLATT obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law of imprisonment for debt, to extend the remedies of creditors, and to punish fraudulent debtors.

NOTICES OF MOTION.—The following notices were given in the House of Commons on Tuesday evening:—Mr. A. Pellatt gave notice that he should move on Thursday that "the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House to consider the Income and Property Tax Acts, which were passed expressly to defray the expenses of the war with Russia, and that the House is of opinion that the war having happily terminated, the said Acts, or so much thereof, shall be repealed as to reduce the tax from 16d. to 6d. and that the same should cease and determine on the 5th of April next."—Major Reed gave notice of a similar motion for Tuesday next.—Mr Munts, to move resolutions against the Income-tax on Friday, Feb. 13.—Mr Ingram's motion for a Select Committee to "inquire into the method of collecting the Inland Revenue of the country, and to report any improvement they may recommend in this department of the public service," will be brought forward early in the session

GRAND INVESTITURE OF THE KNIGHTS OF THE ORDER OF ST PATRICK. A grand Investiture of the Knights of this illustrious Order was held on the 30th ult., under circumstances of unusual interest, in the Presence Chamber, Dublin Castle. The Knights invested were the Earl of Granard and Lord Viscount Gough, G.C.B.—the first remarkable for being perhaps the most youthful Knight that was ever admitted to the ranks of the order; and the latter renowned no less for the daunt[illegible] heroism and genuine chivalry of his personal character, than for the high military services which he rendered to the country in the memorable campaign of "the Tipperary Chief" in the remotest quarters of the British possessions, in either case a choice deservedly popular, and reflecting lustre on the Grand Mastership of the Earl of Carlisle. The present investiture was remarkable for three leading features—first, that it was followed, for the first time since the great installation of George IV., by a banquet, given by the Lord Lieutenant, in St. Patrick's Hall, to which nearly a hundred guests were invited; secondly, that it was the first that has taken place since the restoration of St. Patrick's Hall to its original splendour, when it justly acquired the reputation of being one of the most magnificent assembly-rooms in Europe; and, thirdly, from its being held contemporaneously with the Levee and Drawingroom—at a time when perhaps a greater number of the nobility and personages of distinction were assembled in Dublin than at any former period since the Union. (We propose giving next week an Illustration and a full detail of the above-mentioned magnificent Banquet in St. Patrick's Hall.)

THE KING OF OUDE.—A rumour having been spread, and generally believed, that the Oude question is settled by the grant of an hereditary pension, W. W. Bird and Mohl. Moore, two members of Parliament for Oude, state that his Majesty the King of Oude distinctly refused such terms as the above from the first, and that the rumour is entirely without foundation.

INCOME-TAX MEETING AT CHELSEA.—A crowded meeting against the Income-tax was held last evening at Lloyd's Assembly Rooms, Chelsea; Mr. R. Mullis, Q.C., M.P., in the chair. Resolutions in favour of the immediate removal of the "war tax," and condemnatory of indiscriminately taxing precarious and permanent incomes, were carried unanimously. Messrs. West, Hawkins, Archbott, and other gentlemen took part in the proceedings.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE PAPER DUTY.—DEPUTATION TO THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.—On Wednesday last, at one o'clock, a number of gentlemen, most of them members of the Association for Promoting the Repeal of the Taxes on Knowledge, with Mr. Milner Gibson, M.P., at their head, had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at his official residence in Downing-street, for the purpose of pressing on his attention the necessity of repealing the Excise-duty on paper. Mr. Milner Gibson briefly introduced the deputation to the right hon. gentleman, describing it as being composed of gentlemen belonging to the above-named society, and of others interested in the manufacture of paper, and also in trade generally. Their object, he added, was to bring under the consideration of the Government the necessity of dealing with the paper-duty on its own merits and as a matter of financial policy. The subject had been investigated by Parliamentary committees and commissions, and successive Ministers had held out expectations that this paper-duty ought to be dealt with; but it had been postponed from time to time, and the deputation had thought that no further delay should stand in the way of the question being seriously entertained by the Government. There were gentlemen present who would point out to the right hon. gentleman some of the evils of the tax, and he should not, therefore, occupy more time, except to say that many of the best friends of education throughout the country thought the primary thing to be done towards carrying out their views on that subject was to remove the obstacles which now stood in the way of the diffusion of knowledge. Mr. C. D. Collett, secretary of the Society for the Repeal of the Taxes on Knowledge, then read a memorial setting forth their views on the subject under consideration; after which Mr. Baldwin, of Birmingham, Mr. Rawlins, of Wrexham, and other gentlemen interested in the trade, entered into explanations regarding the peculiar hardship of the paper-duty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer promised, of course, to give the matter his best attention.

ROYAL DISPENSARY FOR DISEASES OF THE EAR.—The half-yearly meeting of this useful institution was held on Thursday last at the Dispensary, Dean-street, Soho; Mr. W. T. Cooper in the chair. The secretary announced that the dispensary had afforded treatment to an increased number of applicants during the last half-year. The annual account of the new admissions, Mr. Harvey, the surgeon to the institution, stated to the meeting, were 1052 cured, 174 consisting of discharges from the ear, nine in the head and ear, nervous affections of the head, rheumatic deafness, diseases of the throat, with some aggravated forms of polypus in the ear, and other diseases of a kindred nature.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—At the meeting on Monday next, the 9th inst., the following papers will be read:—1. Notes on the route from Bushire to Shiraz; by Lieut.-General Sir Wm. Monteith. To be followed by—2. Observations on the Geography of Southern Persia, with reference to the pending military operations; by Colonel Sir Henry Rawlinson. 3. Commentaries on the Battle of Sellasia, &c.; by Lieut.-General Jochmus.

ROYAL FREE HOSPITAL, GRAY'S-INN-ROAD.—The number of patients relieved at this hospital during the week ending Jan. 31 was 2302, of which 730 were new cases.

HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION, BROMPTON.—On Thursday a meeting of the friends of this invaluable charity was held at the boardroom of the hospital, at Brompton. From the report of the committee it appears that the recent extension of the building, by which the number of wards were more than doubled, and the beds at once increased from 90 to 230, has enabled the committee to meet the urgent claims of the afflicted poor, without the tedious and dangerous delay of treatment otherwise inevitable. The hospital, being completed to the extent originally contemplated, now possesses every appliance necessary for the consumptive patient, and adequate funds are only needed to keep it in full and constant operation. Application has been made to some of the different medical examining boards in the metropolis to recognise attendance on the Hospital for Consumption as part of the medical practice required of candidates for examination. Favourable replies have been received from the University of London, the Apothecaries' Company, the Navy Medical Department, and the East India Company.

PRESERVATION OF LIFE FROM SHIPWRECK.—On Tuesday a meeting of the Royal National Life-boat Institution was held at its house, John-street, Adelphi; Thomas Chapman, Esq., F.R.S., in the chair. The gallant services rendered during the awful gales that swept the coast in the beginning of last month were reported to the meeting, and are as follows. The Hauxley (Northumberland) life-boat, on Peake's plan, saved the crew of eleven in sight of the brig Sophie, of Oporto. On the same day this life-boat also rescued the crew of five men of the schooner Georgiana, of Inverness. The Scarborough new life-boat, on Peake's plan, saved the crew, consisting of twenty-six persons, of the brig The Thompsons, of London; the brig Northumberland, of Whitby; and the brig Wilsons, of Shields. The Filey life boat rescued the crew of nine hands. The Lytham life-boat assisted in bringing the flat Turner and her crew from the dangerous Horse Bank Sands, near Liverpool. The Rhyl tubular life-boat rescued four men from the Temperance, of Belfast. The Kessingland life-boat saved the crew of nine men of the barque Emma, of North Shields. The Walmer life-boat (on Peake's plan) rescued fifteen persons from the barque Reliance, of London. Several members of the Royal Thames Yacht Club had generously contributed £160 to the National Life-boat Institution, towards the cost of the latter life-boat. The Ramsgate, Broadstairs, and Shields life-boats had also performed valuable services by rescuing numerous persons from many wrecks on that disastrous occasion. The gallant crews of the above-named life-boats have all received pecuniary rewards for their gallant services, either from the National Life-boat Institution or from Lloyd's. A Mr. William M'Kerrell has munificently offered the institution £180 towards the founding of a first class life-boat establishment. It appears from returns made to the Board of Trade that the number of wrecks was about 340, and the lives lost therefrom about 186. But it is a most gratifying fact that the number of lives saved on that disastrous occasion, chiefly by life-boats and the life preserving apparatus, was 362. The silver medal of the institution, and other rewards, were voted to several gentlemen in acknowledgment of their gallant services in saving life from shipwreck on recent occasions.

PUBLIC PARKS FOR THE METROPOLIS.—At a special meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works on Tuesday the report of the committee upon this subject was presented to the Board; and a deputation of ratepayers and ratepayers from Mile-end, Poplar, and Limehouse attended, with plans and estimates for a new road from the East Indiaroad to the Mile-end New-road, and for improving the Grove-road, to form a communication between Limehouse and Victoria-park. The plans were referred to the committee. Mr Wright moved, "That immediate measures be taken for the establishment of two parks, one in the southern, and one in the northern parts of the metropolis, as recommended by the Works' Committee; and that, apart from any contribution to be obtained from Government, the expense be equally assessed upon the whole metropolis" He observed that in the western portions of the metropolis there were seven parks, but in the eastern part there was but one open space, Victoria park. His motion would involve an outlay of £100,000, and £200,000 for Islington; but there was no doubt that the Government would contribute at least £50,000. Mr. Savage seconded the motion. Mr. Ayrton said that less than a farthing rate in the pound, spread over a period of forty years, would defray the whole expense of making these two parks. Mr. D'Ifinger moved as an amendment, that after the word "metropolis," in Mr. Wright's motion, that the [illegible] or the [illegible] of Hampstead Heath" be added. The amendment was [illegible] to 8, and Mr. Wright's motion carried by 10 to 8. On the motion of Mr Wright it was resolved to communicate with the Government upon the purchase of Hampstead Heath; and a resolution was also passed adopting the proceedings of the Islington vestry with reference to the Finsbury Park, and undertaking to promote the bill in the House of Commons. The City Commission of Sewers, at their meeting on Tuesday, unanimously agreed to oppose the Finsbury Park Bill, if it should attain to a second reading in the House of Commons, the ground of opposition is the additional charge on the ratepayers of the City which is proposed by the bill.

SUDDEN DEATH OF THE SECRETARY OF THE REFORM CLUB. On Tuesday morning Mr Bedford, the coroner for Westminster, held an inquest at the Reform Club, Pall-mall, on the body of Mr. William King Norway, secretary of that institution. From the evidence adduced it appeared that some time since Mr. Norway broke one of his legs, and from that time had been in the habit of taking laudanum to allay the pain, which sometimes had been very severe. On Friday last he suffered acutely in consequence of the cold, and took more than his usual dose—a circumstance which unhappily resulted in his death. The jury at once returned a verdict of "Accidental poisoning." Mr Norway was greatly esteemed by members of the club.

WEST LONDON UNION.—The Guardians of this Union, on Tuesday last, on the motion of Mr. Joshua W. Butterworth, unanimously adopted a petition to the Legislature for London praying for the immediate establishment of Public Baths and Washhouses, as well as Model Lodging Houses for the Industrial Poor, on the site of Farringdon Market; and also for the beneficial appropriation of the numerous waste sites in the Union occasioned by the wholesale destruction at the hands of the Corporation of the dwellings of the poorer classes sought to be relieved by the building of the Model Lodging Houses prayed for in the petition. These unoccupied [illegible] were also shown to be at the same time most detrimental to the interests of the ratepayers of the Union, by keeping so considerable the amount of rateable property therein, and thereby causing such burdens which should be borne by the many to be severely visited on the few.

THE UNEMPLOYED POOR.—THREATENED RIOTOUS PROCEEDINGS.

On Monday last large bodies of workmen, chiefly labourers, assembled in Smithfield, and afterwards draughted themselves off in batches or parties of 200 or 300 each, to the various parishes, for the purpose of obtaining relief. Shortly after three o'clock a detachment of between 200 and 400, chiefly Irish labourers, arrived in front of the vestry-hall, St. Pancras Workhouse, in the King's-road, and having been marshalled in line two or three deep, by a Mr. M'Heath, a coffee-house keeper in Weston-street, Somers Town, and two or three other leaders by whom they were headed, M'Heath and the leaders entered the department appropriated to relief, and headed by Mr. Clarke, the chief relieving overseer, a note signed by M'Heath, which stated that he and those with him appeared there to demand relief for themselves and those who were waiting outside; and expressed a hope that it would be at once afforded, in order to prevent a collision between the unemployed and the parochial authorities

On receiving the note, Mr. Clarke held a consultation with Mr. Hibbard, the clerk to the directors and guardians, the result of which was that the officers were engaged in relieving women, it being "female relief day," and that they would enter into an investigation of all the cases, and afford relief on the following morning. The moment the leaders made their appearance among the crowd outside there was a tremendous rush up the steps to the doors, and, on the reply being given, there were loud vociferations of "Shame, shame!" and murmurs, and it was with some difficulty that the police were enabled to keep the foremost men from forcing their way through the gates to the relief department. A shout, however, was raised, "To the police court!" and the mob began to move towards the police court, Clerkenwell. The majority of the men having been recognised as the same who had applied on the previous Monday, and who had been offered and refused employment three days during the week, Mr. Wiswould, one of the inquiring agents under the direction of Mr. Hibbard, at once proceeded to the Clerkenwell Police Court to inform the magistrate thereof, and take his advice as to what was to be done in the emergency. The advice received by Mr. Wiswould through the chief clerk was, that the authorities of St. Pancras should, instead of giving relief, as they had done last week, adopt the system which had been adopted by the authorities of Clerkenwell and Islington—namely, to apply the workhouse test by at once admitting all the applicants into the house. On Mr. Wiswould's return he was speedily followed by the men, who began to vociferate loudly; and it was the opinion of some of the police on duty that it only wanted the indiscretion of one or two leaders to cause a serious riot. Mr. Hadfield, the master of the workhouse, was communicated with to know what accommodation he could afford in the event of the event of the large body of men accepting the offer of admission which the Clerkenwell police authorities advised should be proffered to them. The governor of the workhouse refused to take any such responsibility upon himself. The casual wards were already overcrowded, and he would not run the risk of admitting 200 or 300 men within the walls of the establishment. Messengers were dispatched for the churchwardens, in order that they might take upon themselves the responsibility of ordering the men to be admitted. Ultimately the workhouse test, like the labour test, had its effect, for, when the men heard what had been determined upon, a great many went off, and scarcely any of those who remained accepted the offer of an immediate order of admission to the house. They were thereby at a late hour in the evening gradually dispersed.

At eight o'clock in the evening a very crowded meeting was held at the Institution, 22, Weston-street, Somers-town, for the purpose of receiving the reports of the deputations that had attended the various parishes after the meeting in Smithfield. Mr. John Brien occupied the chair, when the different reports were presented and read. After which the chairman addressed those assembled as to the propriety of maintaining order, and the meeting separated.

SALE OF THE WEST-END BRANCHES OF THE ROYAL BRITISH BANK.—On Tuesday last at Garraway's sale-rooms, the several leasehold buildings lately used as the West-end branches of the Royal British Bank, were offered to public auction by Mr. R. Chadwick, auctioneer, in four lots.

THE GOLD ROBBERY.—Mr. Clark, the clerk of the Central Criminal Court, has received a communication from Mr. Baron Martin, directing him to make out an order for the Turkish Bonds that were now in the possession of Pierce, one of the bullion robbers, to be delivered up to Mr. Rees, the solicitor to the South-Eastern Railway, in trust for Fanny Kay and her infant child.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On Wednesday afternoon, between the hours of one and two o'clock, a fire, attended with fatal consequences, broke out at the residence of Mr. Burrow, Plumber, Market St. Giles's, on the first floor. Mrs. Lucy Andrews endeavoured to extinguish the flames, but her clothing became ignited, and she rushed on to the landing, where she dropped down. The unfortunate woman was taken to the hospital, but died on her admission. The engines of the London Brigade soon arrived, and the flames were extinguished.

THE DOUBLE MURDER IN WALWORTH.—Thomas Fuller Bacon and Martha Bacon, his wife, were again brought up from Newmonger-lane Gaol on Wednesday, to be further examined—the latter charged with the inquisition with the wilful murder of Edwin Fuller Bacon, aged two years and a half, and Sarah Ann Bacon, aged eleven months; and the former on suspicion of being the actual perpetrator of the crime, and upon which his unfortunate wife stands charged. The court was completely crammed. The male prisoner, who appeared pale and dejected, was brought in first. As on the former examination, he seemed almost to avoid the gaze of all present, and endeavoured to do so by hurrying to that part of the prisons' dock which he occupied on the former day a seat in which prevented a great part of the audience from having more than a mere profile view of his countenance. Mrs. Bacon continues to improve, and appears to be perfectly sane and rational. She was accommodated with a seat, with her friends in a position, as she herself requested, that her husband could not see her. When Bacon supposed she had entered the court he anxiously towards the place where she sat, in the hope of being able to see her. Finding that he could not do so, he sat down again, apparently gloomy and indifferent. Several witnesses were examined. Among others, Mrs. Ann Hyde, a witness who had been sent for to sit up in the house with the prisoner and Mrs. Payne and her daughter after the murder. Bacon had said to her on several occasions that he did not believe his wife had done it; but if she said anything to implicate him in the matter he would kill her. Two or three nights after going to the house, and at about three o'clock in the morning, Bacon was standing before a looking-glass, with his elbow on the mantelshelf, and his forehead on the palm of his hand—and it might be he was doing—when he exclaimed, "Good God! how was it I done it!" She added that Bacon appeared, in her rather sanguine opinion, in a mental state of misery. The two prisoners were remanded for another week.

THE CITY UNION FRAUDS.—At the Central Criminal Court on Thursday last, Solon Paul, aged sixty, late a clerk in the City of London Union, was found guilty of the fact, charged with numerous frauds upon the guardians of the Union; and to the various indictments he pleaded "Not Guilty." The first indictment proceeded with was a charge of stealing a cheque for £20 10s. 2d. It appeared from the evidence of Mr. Heath, one of the guardians, that the cheque in question was handed over to the prisoner in the ordinary way of business to pay to Messrs. Kingsford and Co., the contractors for flour furnished to the Union, and which was drawn upon Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Co. The prisoner, instead of paying the cheque to Messrs. Kingsford, paid it into his own bankers', and converted it to his own use. Several witnesses were called to prove the fact that the cheque was paid by the prisoner into the London Bank (the prisoner's bankers), and its amount paid to them by Smith, Payne, and Co. Mr. Serjeant Ballantine addressed the jury on the part of the prisoner in a most able speech, insisting that the conduct of the prisoner in dealing with the cheque, and paying it into his own bankers', was not in law a larceny, but merely a breach of trust. Mr. Justice Wightman, in summing up the evidence, said the sole question for the jury was whether they were satisfied that the prisoner, at the time of converting the cheque to his own use, intended to steal it. The jury, after an absence of fifty minutes, returned a verdict of "Guilty." The learned Judge ordered the prisoner to be called up for judgment, and sentenced him to be transported for fourteen years

THE SAWARD FORGERIES CASE.—On Thursday last James Townsend Saward and James Anderson, who stand charged with being concerned in a series of gigantic frauds and forgeries on Messrs. Smith and Co., Messrs. Gowing, and other bankers and merchants, were placed at the bar before the Lord Mayor for further examination. The evidence adduced was entirely of a corroborative nature in support of the main feature, which has been already published in the columns. The Lord Mayor remanded the prisoners until Wednesday next, when the depositions will be read over, and the prisoners finally committed for trial at the March sessions of the Central Criminal Court.

CENTRAL AMERICAN WAR.

THE last accounts from Central America represent General Walker's position as exceedingly critical; indeed, it seems very doubtful whether he will be able to hold out much longer. A correspondent of the Times, writing from Greytown on the 6th January, gives some interesting information regarding the late proceedings in that quarter. It appears that Mr. Vanderbilt, the celebrated shipowner, has been planning lately how to regain possession of those river and lake steamers which he accuses Walker of having taken from him without rendering due compensation, and upon which the Filibuster General depends entirely for his supplies and reinforcements. For some weeks Mr Vanderbilt had been concerting measures with the Costa Ricans, and, on the 5th of December, a body of 200 men, under the charge of Mr. Spencer, Mr. Vanderbilt's agent, left San José, and, after a laborious march of 200 miles reached the San Carlos river. By means of flats and canoes they descended to Fort Serapiqué, which was garrisoned by 40 Americans, under Captain Thompson. This officer, although informed that rafts filled with Costa Ricans had been seen upon the river, through some unaccountable negligence, allowed himself to be surprised at midday on the 22nd December. Most of the American soldiers, panic-stricken, rushed into the water, where they were either drowned or shot. Others were bayonetted on the spot. Ten alone out of forty survive, and have been brought down here Immediately after this successful assault Spencer descended in his canoes to this place, where four of the river steamers were lying. These he surprised before daylight on the morning of the 23rd. The suddenness of the seizure, and the unexpected appearance of a number of armed Costa Ricans, rendered any attempt at resistance by the few unarmed men in charge hopeless; and in a few hours afterwards Spencer was steaming back again up the river with the four steamers which were intended to convey the reinforcements daily expected from New York and New Orleans to Walker

Reascending the San Juan to the fort of Serapiqué, Spencer left three of his steamers there, and placed a strong garrison in the place for his small force was now augmented by 500 men, and proceeded up the river to Toro, the commencement of the lake navigation, where a small steamer used for crossing the rapids and the lake steamer were lying. Thus Spencer found no difficulty in capturing, and in it he ascended to Fort San Carlos. Here he hoisted the usual signal, and invited some of the unsuspecting garrison on board, at the same time sending a party of 75 men to the rear of the fort. The principal officers of the fort were seized immediately upon their coming on board; and the Costa Ricans, rushing upon it from the rear, took the fort without the smallest resistance being offered to them. The lake steamer from Virgin Bay, with 400 Californian passengers on board, was next seized with the same consummate dexterity which had characterised all Spencer's proceedings.

Finding that, with the exception of thirty sick and wounded men from Walker's army, there were only Californians anxious to reach their destination on board, he ran his steamer alongside, and, to the astonishment of the passengers, informed them that he, together with fifty Costa Ricans, would be their escort to Greytown. He consequently arrived the day before yesterday at this place, and had scarcely landed his passengers when he perceived the Texas arriving from New Orleans. Knowing that she was bringing large reinforcements to Walker, he lost no time in preparing to escape up the river Before doing so, however, he determined to ascertain the amount of the force, and crossing over to Point Arenas anchored in shoal water, within 200 yards of the spot at which the Texas dropped her anchor On board this steamer 250 armed men, in the utmost excitement, were making preparations to capture the hardy little craft which had already achieved so much. The pilot had informed them as they crossed the bar of the state of affairs, and they perceived that unless they could succeed in effecting this all chance of reaching Walker was hopeless They had just decided on their plan of action when the little boat got up steam and vanished slowly round the green point which, covered with luxuriant foliage, stretches across the river at the head of the bay At this moment the disappointed passengers of the Texas are working indefatigably at sunrise and sunset with a few days' labour may render available for the ascent of the river Hay are hardy, determined men, led by officers who have already served in many a hard-fought field, and, if the recapture of the forts and steamers and ascent of the river is possible, they are not the men to be foiled. On the other hand, it is reported that Spencer is fortifying Serapiqué, and it is resolved to contest every point upon the river, and, if hard pressed, ultimately to burn the steamers. Walker, although his army is in good fighting condition, has no means of transporting it across the lake, and, moreover, is fully occupied in protecting Rivas. Everything, therefore, must depend upon the exertions of the last arrivals The steamer Tennessee is hourly expected from New York with a reinforcement of 150 men, but her non-appearance gives some ground for supposing that there is truth in the rumours of her arrest by the Government which were rife at New Orleans before the departure of the Texas

The English squadron, under the command of Captain Erskine, of the Orion, has abstained from taking any share whatever in these proceedings; the only desire on the part of the British authorities here has been to prevent bloodshed, and, while expressing their determination to this effect to both parties, they have not, fortunately, been obliged to take forcible measures against either

We have engraved a View of Greytown, sketched by a Correspondent. The place is interesting as the head-quarters of Captain Erskine's squadron In the Sketch you look to the west: the anchorage and harbour are out of sight, on the right hand; inside those weeds at the time the Sketch was taken, the gun-boats Pioneer, Intrepid, and Vator, with the corvettes Cossack and Archer, and the frigate Arrogant at anchor The Orion and Imperieuse were obliged to anchor outside the spit as there were only four-and-a-half fathoms of water over the bar.

SKETCHES FROM CHINA.

CHINESE WOMAN GATHERING TEA.

WE are not surprised to find in the volume of Drawings by a Chinese artist, which has recently been placed at our disposal, "A Woman Gathering Tea." To the cultivation and manufacture of this wonderful plant the Chinese mainly owe their world-wide celebrity. Its use, as collected from the works of the Chinese, is traced to the fabulous period of their history the earliest account of the plant being contained in the "She King," one of the classical works of high antiquity and veneration among the Chinese, and compiled by their renowned philosopher and great moralist, Confucius. In a set of illustrations of the characteristics of the country, the gathering of tea is, therefore, as appropriate as it is interesting. It has been for ages the theme of Chinese poets, the idol of their husbandmen, and the highest favourite of the Emperor and his Government; and in our own country the deprivation of the article of tea would prove a calamity of no slight importance. It affords a luxury to the rich, and a blessing to the poor; and the moral effect of this beverage, as preventing recourse to stronger stimulants, is indubitable.

From Mr. Ball's excellent work on the "Cultivation and Manufacture of Tea," we have the following from the chapter on the Time of Gathering:—

Cunningham states that the tea-shrubs flower at Chusan from October to January, and that the seed is ripe in September or October. Ting Hing, a respectable green tea factor, states that they flower from September to November; another green tea factor, so late as February. Kœmpfer observes that at Japan the shrubs flower from August until late in the winter. Von Siebold states from November to February.

A Chinese manuscript states:—

In the mild and temperate season of spring the shrubs shoot forth their leaves, when such as are young and delicate must be chosen. These that are partly unfolded, long like a needle and covered with down, must be gathered to be made into Pekoe. A few days after Ko Yu (20th April) the leaves become large, and are called the first gathering (Yeu Chun) These are thick and substantial, fragrant in smell, and sweet in flavour. When the leaves of the first gathering are exhausted, wait till they shoot out anew, about Chung (6th June), when they must be gathered and made. These are called the second gathering (Ul Chun), the flavour of which has no fragrance, and the colour of the leaf is of a dingy black. The leaves shoot out again at the summer solstice (Hia Chy); these are called the third gathering (San Chun), and are of a light green colour and coarse in smell.

The "Vû Ye Shan Chy" (the statistical work of the black tea country already alluded to) states that

The first gathering is fragrant in smell and full flavoured. The second has no smell and is weak in flavour. The third has a little smell, but is also weak in flavour

The Chinese say that the Yen or Padre Souchong tea must be gathered not only in clear and bright weather, but that those teas only are of the first quality which are gathered during a continuation of fine weather, and even after noon, during the greatest heat of the day. On the other hand, a Chinese manuscript states, that "those which are gathered in rainy weather are poor and tasteless, and unfit for Pao Chong or Padre Souchong; though they will, nevertheless, do for Sino Pocy and Ta Pocy, or fine Souchong

A further difference is also occasioned by the selection of particular shrubs, and of the best or most succulent leaves at the time of gathering

CHINESE MILITARY STANDARD-BEARER.—FROM A DRAWING BY A CHINESE ARTIST.

It is said to be a common practice among those merchants who are in the habit of frequenting the habitations of the Priests or Bonzes to contract for the produce of certain known shrubs These are labelled according to their supposed resemblance in flavour to particular flowers, and at the season of Baing Ming, in the early part of the year, they repair to these plantations, where they prepare the tea themselves. In these cases each leaf is said to be plucked separately from the shrubs; and the leaves of such shrubs as are known to resemble each other in flavour are mixed together and kept apart throughout the whole manipulation. They are also packed in small paper parcels, each weighing about eight or twelve ounces, sometimes bearing on them, in large flowing Chinese characters, the name of the flower they are supposed to resemble in odour; and sometimes the name of the hill of their growth in small neatly-written characters These symbols can hardly have escaped the observation of the dealer and consumer This care is, however, is only bestowed on the finest description of Paouchong tea, which is collected in very small quantities.

In the Illustration it may be supposed that some beautiful variety of the tea-plant is represented. The gathering is a process of great piety and importance. Each leaf is plucked separately from the stalk. The hands of the gatherer are kept carefully clean, and in collecting some of the fine sorts the gatherer hardly ventures to breathe on the plant. At a place called Udsi, in the islands of Japan, is a mountain, the climate of which is supposed to be especially congenial to the growth of tea; and the whole crop which grows upon it is reserved for the sole use and disposal of the Emperor.

CHINESE STANDARD-BEARER.

IN our Journal for January 17 we detailed at some length the organisation of the Chinese army. We now engrave from our Artist's drawing a Standard-bearer. From a pole borne over the left shoulder hangs the standard: the ground bearing the characters is crimson.

SCENES IN THE DESERT.

SIMOOM IN THE DESERT.

THE DESERT ROUTE.

IV. THE SIMOOM. V. HALT NEAR EL ARISH.

THE greater part of the distance has been accomplished, and the travellers are nearing the confines of the desert, when the wary and accustomed eye of the old grey-bearded camel driver recognises in the murky banks quickly rising on the hot horizon the near approach of one of those dreadful sand-storms more terrible in their approach than even the mighty hurricanes that rage on the tempest-tossed deep. The camels, with instinctive perception, quicken their pace to a fast trot, while the old man, putting his hand up to his eyes to shade them from the intense mid-day glare, runs on in front in the hope of yet meeting shelter before the fury of the simoom bursts over their heads and smothers them with intense clouds of dust. The strugglers now put their camels' speed to the test; and even the fair lady, in her great anxiety to reach a haven, is glad to furl her parasol and apply it, whip fashion, to the hard neck and shoulders of the camel. The straggling plants, whose long curving roots not unfrequently trip up the hurried foot-man, give indication of the near approach of the caravan to one of those oases of the desert which are strangely fertile and beautiful as the desert itself is arid and unseemly. A range of hills, composed of more ample matter than the desert sands now heave in sight. The travellers quicken their pace, they mount over the mountains sides and carefully descend the rather abrupt descent that conducts them to a valley, such as is presented in the Engraving. The dusky clouds rising high above the hills proclaim the simoom to be raging fiercely on the other side, but there is now a barrier placed between the travellers and the desert tempest. The high hills impede the progress of the sand-clouds; and the lady, alighting from her camel, spreads her parasol again us, seated, under the shade of some pleasant tree on the banks of the small river, she contemplates the beauty of the scene before her. On the other side of the river, where grow tall and graceful poplar-trees, is a small village built on the water's edge, there is a large mosque and a finely built minaret, and the whole town is perfectly reflected in the calm waters of the stream. On the side of the river are a party of Mahometans seated on a carpet spread on the ground, enjoying the cool of the evening and a whiff of tobacco, and waiting till the summons to prayer from the minaret shall be wafted across the water to warn them that the hour for orisons and their evening meal has arrived. Near them are a group of four or five camels that have evidently come off a long journey, as we may judge by their weary looks and attitudes; and further on are the small low tents of the Arabs who wisely prefer encamping outside of the village to being exposed to the heat and filth of a public caravansarai. Our engraving gives a good idea of what these caravansarais usually are, especially those of a more ancient date: a lofty building full of archways supported on rotten stumpy pillars, some of very exquisite workmanship, but which have the strange appearance of what was once a something lofty, suddenly sunk deep into the earth by some violent convulsion of nature. At the caravanserai gate hangs a large lantern, throwing a meagre light on the objects around. Camels and donkeys, men, women, children; an occasional goat, and a few stray hens, have here a common resting-place. Groups of travellers are assembled in various parts of the building making ready for the night; some have taken the wise precaution to mount up on the elevated platform in the building, to avoid as much as possible the plague of fleas; others, too weary to take this precaution, squat themselves down where they best can; some few are busy purchasing little requisites for their suppers from the scanty stalls of the venders many years established both outside and inside of the caravanserai.

THE THEATRES, &c.

Astley's.—The management of this equestrian theatre seems bent on pursuing its course of Shakspearean revival and illustration, which, we presume, has proved profitable. To "Richard the Third" and "Macbeth" succeeds "Katherine and Petruchio," which, as our readers are aware, is an abridgment of the "Taming of the Shrew," after a version made by Garrick. The present management have probably been induced to adopt the subject from its recent production on the Islington stage; but the entire drama, with the induction of Christopher Sly, appears to have been beyond the resources of an undramatic company. The part of Petruchio, as played by Mr. Holloway, is perhaps, less stentorian in attributes than we have seen it when undertaken by more legitimate professors, and, indeed, does great credit to his judgment. The manner with which this performer has conceived would seem to indicate that a popular audience is not necessarily best pleased with rant and bombast; in fact, we have notable proofs to the contrary. Quiet acting is appreciated everywhere. Horses are, of course, introduced where possible—in a wedding procession through the streets of Padua, and in the discomfort experienced by Katherine, which is usually described by Grumio. The latter character was humorously acted by Mr. I. W. Anson. Katherine was effectively played by Mrs. Anson. In the circus we succeeded. By way of novelty, a M. Piege ascended from the pit to the back of the stage upon a broad wheel, conducted over a narrow plank—a perilous feat, beyond doubt, but skilfully and safely accomplished.

Drury Lane.—An old friend with a new face was produced on Monday, under the title of "The Black Book," a drama in three acts. The incidents are familiar to us as the dealings of a certain demoniac personage who many years ago sported his diary on the stage. But Wemyss; Mr. Charles Mathews wished to show his extraordinary talents in the supernatural, and this same dark journal was exactly suited to the purpose. The supposed demon turns out to be an honest lawyer, who undertakes the cause of Mina, the heiress of the Lilleburg barony, whose legitimacy is disputed; but Wolf (for such is the demon attorney's name) knows that the marriage certificate of Mina's mother exists, though the place where is only known to one Hans Casper, a retainer of the family, whose conversation is reduced to the monosyllables "no" and "yes." The lady's relatives are over-anxious to obtain the lady's estate, and not at all particular about the honesty of the means. Wolf has intrusted to *Mina*s' care a black book in which it is supposed the marriage certificate is to be found. This they get hold of, and destroy; and, as it is supposed that Wolf has been killed in a quarrel, Mina's case appears desperate. But the demon appears just when wanted; he is, nevertheless, as much at sea as the rest. Hans Casper is the appointed riddle-solver, and he cannot be got beyond the monosyllables until three articulate words are pronounced. Wolf hits upon them by accident—"The beast in my eye." This same lawyer is one Sturm, by whom the blank book was intrusted to Wolf, and whose dying instructions were left with Hans. The faithful domestic knocks a hole in the floor, and, lo, the marriage certificate! Mina gives her hand to Wolf, as a reward for his trouble; and the curtain descends on a successful denouement.

Miss Catherine Hayes.—This gifted lady has just concluded an extensive and triumphant progress through her native land. She left Belfast on Wednesday night, after having given a morning concert in aid of the funds of the General Hospital—a grateful requital for the kindness of her reception in that town. Her success has been shared by her countryman, Mr. Osborne, and also by the young vocalist Mr. Mullard, who first became known to the public by his excellent appearances at Jullien's concerts.

Ferdinand Glover.—The Neapolitan journals speak in the highest terms of the impression produced by the performance of the above artist in the new opera of "Elnava." The Rondinella of the 31st ult. concludes its notice of it by saying that, owing to the distinguished favour shown to him by the public, this brilliant young artist has been engaged as principal barytono for the Carnival of '57.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The publication of the six great handicap acceptances has put the racing men in a capital humour; and, taking them as a whole, they are very good, and number 313 out of 573 weighted. Darkie, the great mark, has disappeared from the Chester Cup, where the acceptances are 118 out of 188. Vengeance, 9 st., is now the head, while the lowest is only 4 st. 9 lb. Old Alonzo, who is now eleven years old, heads the 33 acceptances out of 93 at Northampton; Fisherman is top weight in both the Epsom handicaps, where each race retains about its entries; Jester, 9 st. 3 lb., gallantly says "contest" among 46 in the Great Northern Handicap, some wretched creature at 4 st. 4 lb. bringing up the rear; and, in the Newmarket Handicap, Aleppo, raised to 8 st. 12 lb., is in the van, so that the quality of the Heath acceptors is not very high. The Liverpool Steeplechase bids fair to have a large field, no fewer than 40 out of 69 have been scratched, and the rest, headed by Escape, 11 st. 9 lb., present, as has been remarked, a complete array of "thirty pound betting-office trash." Mr. Topham's determination to stand out against high weights is well known, and hence this once-famed contest has sunk into a mere lightweight scurry in hands. In fact, no gentleman will send a hunter or any value to run at such feather weights, in such wretched company. There was a time when sportsmen felt proud of having a horse in it; now they do not think it even worth going to see.

The £270 subscription has been distributed among the seven injured jockeys, all of whom are up and doing again. Bartholemew gets £80 for his "concussion of the brain," and the same is given to two others for "broken leg" and "severe injuries" respectively. Aubrey gets £60 for "a broken collarbone"—rather high considering his short illness; and four "contusions" receive £30 each. The liberality of the racing world, which was never yet known to fail, has shone forth especially here, and it is a most providential termination to what looked a most appalling accident.

Weatherbit's sensible at Tattersall's for 600 gs. on Tuesday; Fly-by-Night was bought in for 700 gs.; and there was scarcely one bid for Windex, whose reserve price was exceedingly high.

It is finally arranged that the present master of the Cheshire is to give up the country at the end of the present season, which is one season earlier than that which he took it originally. He has not been able to draw any of his best country, and hence Edwards and his celebrated whip, Tom Rance, have been perpetually obliged to stop the hounds in the midst of a run. The men are well up to the mark and very well mounted. Poor Mr. Shadwell, the Cheshire huntsman under Captain White, died last Saturday morning, after a year of severe labours. The gentlemen of the hunt were exceedingly kind to him; and, although he sufficiently recovered from his internal injury (received from a fall while hunting a Scotch pack last season) to come out of the Chester Infirmary in May, he never knew any real health afterwards. He was in earlier days a great man with Mr. Musters.

The wooden fox at Tattersall's looks down from the top of its pump, all tied round with straw, at hosts of frozen-out huntsmen and their "governors" beneath, who flock up there on Mondays for sheer lack of something better to do. They have not, however, much reason to grumble so far, as till the present frost commenced, there had hardly been ten non-hunting days. The Sporting Review (which has a capital engraving of Fandango after Harry Hall) states, with reference to Jack Morgan's resignation of his place as first whip to Lord Henry Bentinck next May, that he had the offer of being field-huntsman to his Lordship this season, while Dick Burton was to have been installed as kennel-huntsman, but that he declined it. The West Kent hounds (a fifty-couple bitch pack) and the stud will be sold at Tattersall's on Monday, unless a private purchaser steps in. A proposition to erect a memorial to "old Will Smith," of the Brocklesby, progresses steadily. It will be placed near Barnoldby Church, on the very spot where he met his death. The committee thought at first of erecting an obelisk, but we believe that they now contemplate a small pillar, inscribed with his name and the date of his death, and planted round with evergreens. Mr. Nunby, of Barnoldby, has generously presented the plot of ground for the purpose, and the requisite amount is being collected in small subscriptions. Four or five generations of Smiths have hunted these Lounds, and Tom, the present huntsman, bids fair to be as popular as his ill-fated father.

Thursday and Friday constitute the new fixture for the Oundle Steeplechases, which would have been a very merry affair if they had come off at the right season, as the "little town in the woodlands" was quite full of sheeted Lorses and "wasting" jockeys. The 1st has played sad havoc with coursing meetings; and, for the second time this season, the Newmarket meeting, which is fixed for next Monday and the following days, seems in sad jeopardy of being put off. The order has been so lost, and meetings have become so huddled together, that it is impossible at this moment to say how the list stands. The original fixtures, however, for the week include Bedlington, on Monday; Malton, Anthem, and Hall Place (Berkshire), on Tuesday; and Knipe Scar, on Thursday. Four of Mr. Randell's celebrated greyhounds—Reveller, Rhapsody, Radiant, and Archibald—are in the market, along with Raven, the dam of the two former, and a rare specimen of the Foremost and Black Fly blood. For those who desire to read about coursing and training there can be no more agreeable amusement than the letters of some celebrated greyhound-owners on the subject in the newest edition of the "Coursing Annual." It is there given as Mr. M'George's remark, that Rice was the best greyhound he ever rode to.

Hunting Jubilee.—On the 28th ult., in the Assembly room, Blandford, a grand dinner was given to celebrate the hunting jubilee of J. J. Farquharson, Esq., who for fifty years has been sole master and entire supporter of a pack of foxhounds, totally independent of any subscriptions a circumstance unparalleled in the history of hunting. Two hundred and fifty guests sat down to a splendid entertainment; T. E. Daddaffe, Esq., the Sheriff of the county, in the chair; supported on his right by J. J. Farquharson, Esq., Lord Ashley, Gerald St.rt. Esq., M.P., J. J. Farquharson, Esq., jun.; on his left Lord Digby, J. Floyer, Esq., General Porter, Captain Sturt, M.P., J. D. Deyther, Esq., &c. The room was tastefully decorated with laurel and evergreens, and appropriate devices of fox-hunting—four hunting prints and two paintings. In a canopy erected at the head of the room was the elegant vase presented to Mr. Farquharson in 1834; and on each side were the candelabra presented on the present occasion. The usual toasts and speeches were enlivened by songs, kept it up to a late hour. Had the weather permitted there would have been a meet of the foxhounds on the following morning.

Forty Degrees Below Zero.—The terrible storm which began here on Sunday afternoon continued with unexampled violence until last night. It also extended for a great distance in every direction, reaching from the eastward to the lakes, and from the Potomac to Canada. The cold of Sunday night was intense, and in this region at least, within the present century. All along the northern frontier the mercury went down ten, twenty, and thirty degrees below zero; and at Watertown, in the State of New York, on the night of the storm below, while a spirit thermometer marked forty degrees below zero, or seventy-two degrees below the freezing-point of the "oldest inhabitant" is beaten at last. He cannot remember the equal of New York City in 1857. Night Skating-Match.—The opening of the Houses of Parliament has caused a great influx of members of the nobility and gentry to the metropolis, most of whom have visited the different localities to witness the thousands of persons who were enjoying the exhilarating exercise of skating. From the early hour of eight in the morning the carriage-drives in Hyde-park have been literally studded with the rich equipages belonging to the aristocracy, filled with members of the nobility and their friends. The announcement that a night skating-match was to come off on Wednesday attracted a large number of ladies and gentlemen to the Serpentine; and never more than last night were they upon the ice. The reflection from the flambeaux had a very picturesque effect. Mr. Superintendent Williams, upon seeing so great a number of persons upon the ice, had a number of persons who were enjoying the exhilarating exercise of skating [illegible]

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

THE fifth Session of the fourth Parliament of Queen Victoria was opened on Tuesday last by Royal Commission. The ceremony was, of course, of a purely formal character. The presence of the Sovereign, which gives éclat to all public acts of a ceremonial character, was wanting on this occasion; and the House of Lords presented anything but the imposing appearance which it always wears when Peers and Peeresses, the Diplomatic Corps, and the Illustrissimi of the land assemble to greet the Sovereign at the opening of a new Session. The severity of the weather also tended to keep away many who would otherwise have been present at the ceremony. The doors of the House were thrown open at one o'clock, when some fifty or sixty ladies were admitted to the third and fourth rows of benches usually occupied by Peers. The attendance of Peers was limited to six. Of these five took their seats on the lower bench nearest the throne on the Opposition side of the chamber; Lord Willoughby d'Eresby, Lord Berners, and the Earl of Erne were among the number. The only Peer on the Government bench was Earl Cowper. The Bishop of Lincoln attended in his place to say prayers.

At half-past one the great bell of Westminster commenced a rather solemn peal, and continued to thunder forth its summons in anything but jocund strains till two o'clock, when the Lords Commissioners, preceded by the Usher of the Black Rod, made their appearance in the house and took their seats in front of the throne. The Lords Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Argyll, Lord Stanley of Alderley, the Earl of Harrowby, and Earl Spencer. The Royal commission having been read, her Majesty's faithful Commons were summoned by Sir Augustus Clifford; and the Speaker, accompanied by Lord Palmerston, Mr. Bonverie, Mr. Rochuck, Mr. Bowyer, Sir S. Bignold, Sir W. Clay, Mr. Hindley, Mr. Scott, Mr. Swift, Mr. Oliveira, Colonel Dunne, Mr. Otway, Mr. Cranfurd, and about a hundred other members, appeared at the bar. The Lord Chancellor then read the following Speech:—

THE QUEEN'S SPECH.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

We are commanded to assure you that her Majesty has great satisfaction in recurring again to the advice and assistance of her Parliament.

We are commanded by her Majesty to inform you that difficulties which arose in regard to some of the provisions of the Treaty of Paris, delayed the complete execution of the stipulations of that Treaty. Those difficulties have been overcome in a satisfactory manner, and the intentions of the Treaty have been fully maintained.

An insurrectionary movement which took place in September last in the Swiss Canton of Neufchâtel, for the purpose of re-establishing in that Canton the authority of the King of Prussia as Prince of Neufchâtel led to serious differences between his Prussian Majesty and the Swiss Confederation, threatening at one time to disturb the general peace of Europe.

But her Majesty commands us to inform you that, in concert with her august ally the Emperor of the French, she is endeavouring to bring about an amicable settlement of the matters in dispute, and her Majesty entertains a confident expectation that an honourable and satisfactory arrangement will be concluded.

In consequence of certain discussions which took place during the Conferences at Paris, and which are recorded in the Protocols that were laid before you, her Majesty and the Emperor of the French caused communications to be made to the Government of the King of the Two Sicilies, for the purpose of inducing him to adopt a course of policy calculated to avert dangers which might disturb that Peace which had been so recently restored to Europe.

Her Majesty commands us to inform you, that the manner in which those friendly communications were received by his Sicilian Majesty was such as to lead her Majesty and the Emperor of the French to discontinue their diplomatic relations with his Sicilian Majesty, and they have, accordingly, withdrawn their missions from the Court of Naples

Her Majesty has directed that papers relating to this subject shall be laid before you.

Her Majesty commands us to inform you that she has been engaged in negotiations with the Government of the United States, and also with the Government of Honduras, which she trusts will be successful in removing all cause of misunderstanding with respect to Central America.

Her Majesty has concluded a Treaty of Friendship and Commerce with Siam, which will be laid before you.

Her Majesty commands us to express to you her regret that the conduct of the Persian Government has led to hostilities between her Majesty and the Shah of Persia. The Persian Government, in defiance of repeated warnings, and in violation of its engagements, has besieged and captured the important city of Herat.

We are commanded by her Majesty to inform you that a British naval and military force dispatched from Bombay has taken possession of the Island of Karrak, and of the Persian Fort of Bushire, with a view to induce the Shah to accede to the just demands of her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty has seen with satisfaction that the naval and military forces employed on this occasion have displayed their accustomed gallantry and spirit.

Her Majesty commands us to inform you that acts of violence, insults to the British flag, and infraction of Treaty rights, committed by the local Chinese authorities at Canton, and a pertinacious refusal of redress, have rendered it necessary for her Majesty's officers in China to have recourse to measures of force to obtain satisfaction.

Those measures had, up to the date of the last accounts, been taken with great forbearance, but with signal success as regards the conflicts to which they had led.

We are commanded to inform you that her Majesty trusts that the Government of Pekin will see the propriety of affording the satisfaction demanded, and of faithfully fulfilling its Treaty engagements.

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Her Majesty has directed the Estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you

They have been prepared with every attention to economy, and with a due regard to the efficient performance of the public service at home and abroad.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

Her Majesty commands us to inform you that Bills will be submitted to your consideration for the consolidation and the amendment of important portions of the law; and her Majesty doubts not that you will give your earnest attention to matters so deeply affecting the interests of all classes of her subjects.

Her Majesty commands us to recommend to your consideration the expediency of renewing for a further period the privileges of the Bank of England, the conditions imposed on the issue of bank-notes in the United Kingdom, and the state of the law relating to Joint-stock Banks.

Her Majesty commands us to express the gratification with which she sees her to witness the general well being and contentment of her people and to find that, notwithstanding the sacrifices unavoidably attendant upon such a war as that which has lately terminated, the resources of the country remain unimpaired, and its productive industry continues unchecked in its course of progressive development.

Her Majesty commits herself with confidence the great interests of the country to your wisdom and care, and she fervently prays that the blessing of Almighty God may attend your deliberations, and prosper your councils for the advancement of the welfare and happiness of her loyal and faithful people.

At the conclusion of the Royal Speech the Speaker retired, and prayers were read by the Bishop of Lincoln. The ceremony did not occupy more than half an hour

Their Lordships met again at five o'clock.

NEW BISHOPS.—The Bishops of London and Gloucester took the oaths and their seats. The former was introduced by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Winchester, and the latter by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Lincoln.

NEW PEER.—Lord Belper also took the oaths and his seat. He was introduced by Lord Overstone and Lord Glenelg.

THE ARMY.—The Earl of CARDIGAN gave notice that, on Thursday, he would put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War about matters connected with the Army.

TICKET-OF-LEAVE SYSTEM.—Lord BERNERS gave notice that, on an early day, he would move for returns of the number of tickets of leave issued to convicts in each year since the commencement of the practice, with their original sentence and their unexpired term of imprisonment, and showing the number who had been reapprehended.

APPEARANCE OF THE HOUSE.—The attendance of Peers was very considerable, and the spaces in front of the throne and below the bar were filled with strangers. The Ministers present were—Earl Granville, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of Clarendon, Lord Panmure, the Duke of Argyll, the Earl of Harrowby, and Lord Stanley of Alderley. On the Opposition benches we observed The Earl of Derby, the Earl of Eglinton, the Earl of Hardwicke, the Earl of Malmesbury, and Lord Colchester. The Duke of Cambridge, Lord Wensleydale, and Earl Fitzwilliam sat on the cross benches; and in other parts of the House there were Lord Brougham, Earl Grey, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Duke of Newcastle, Lord Campbell, the Earl of Lucan, &c.

THE ADDRESS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR having read the Royal Speech, and it having been again read by the clerk at the table,

The Earl of CORK rose to move the Address. After briefly referring to the success which had attended the diplomatic efforts of her Majesty's representatives at the Peace Conference, and expressing the terms of congratulation the failure of the attempt to disturb the peace of Europe by the Neufchâtel émeute, his Lordship proceeded to refer to the Persian war. The extreme step had been forced upon her Majesty's Government, not only by Persia's systematic duplicity, but by the reckless spirit of aggression which had characterised that State's attack upon the city of Herat. The despatches which had recently arrived showed the vigour and success with which her Majesty's Government had punished this unjust infraction of their international treaties. To almost the same cause—and the excessive spirit of the people, the disputes with the authorities of Canton might be traced. In spite of the heavy taxation which had pressed upon the resources of this kingdom, their Lordships must be glad to observe the general industrial prosperity which prevailed, and which was indicated by the export returns. He could speak more particularly with regard to the sister country, with which he was immediately connected, and which showed a greater diminution of the poor-rates than had existed for some time past. His Lordship concluded by moving the Address in reply.

The Earl of AIRLIE seconded the Address, and was understood to re-capitulate the various points touched upon in her Majesty's gracious Speech.

The Earl of DERBY regretted that he could not agree with the encomiums which had been lavished upon the Speech which her Majesty's advisers had presented to Parliament. It was most vague, shadowy, and unsatisfactory. The reference to the last Session of Parliament was meagre and unsatisfactory in the last degree; in fact, they were merely requested to make the formal financial arrangements which might be necessary for the public service. But those financial arrangements he thought Parliament would be wanting in its duty if it did not demand the fulfilment of its solemn pledge, that the Income-tax should cease to determine in 1860, and on the faith of which the public had consented to its imposition. But, meagre as was the Speech, it did not contain that formerly well-known paragraph in which the Sovereign congratulated the Parliament on the steady maintenance of peace. On the contrary, now the only Sovereign so alluded to was the King of Siam. The other parts in the Speech were almost equally unsatisfactory. It was mentioned with much satisfaction that, in concert with our august ally, we had put the Neufchâtel question in a fair way of being adjusted; whereas he quite believed that if we had not interfered with our august ally at all the whole matter would have been settled more speedily and amicably. But Lord Palmerston had such a peculiar skill in getting out of a difficulty that he seemed to seek such situations. Turning to another portion of the Speech which referred to our relations with Naples, did this country, he asked, always act uprightly? Did it never keep the "promise to the ear and break it to the hope"? Had we not played with the question of Italian liberty, while the principal result of the Paris Conferences was to make the Austrian rule in Italy more fixed and more permanent than ever? What was the object, and what result had been achieved by the Neapolitan difficulty, except that England and France had received at the hands of that petty State a deliberate and well-deserved affront? The cautiously delivered our policy of late had deprived this country of every friend in the world, except France. After dwelling at length upon each step which had produced the Persian war, he proceeded to comment upon the conduct of the Government in not calling Parliament together when that struggle became inevitable. It was useless to call it at Indian war; it was British, and as such should have been declared by the Sovereign of this country, with the concurrence and approbation of the Parliament. But such remarks applied with still greater force to the proceedings in China, which had filled him with amazement. Was the bombardment of the Canton city, and the indiscriminate slaughter of innocent and guilty in one common doom an act of forbearance, as it was termed in the Speech? He confessed he could not look upon the state of our foreign relations without distrust and misgiving. If he did not then move an amendment to the Address it was in the hope that the opinions which he should undoubtedly entertained would be modified by some papers or protocols which the Government were of course prepared to lay before their Lordships.

The Earl of CLARENDON was sorry that Lord Derby had not adhered to the usual practice, and refrained from any allusion to foreign topics until he was in possession of the full information which would shortly be laid before the House. Had he waited for these documents he would have saved from his the erroneous impression he appeared to entertain with regard to the Neufchâtel question. Neither the English nor French Government was concerned in any way with the resistance which the Swiss Government had met with to the demands of Prussia. It was, indeed, true that her Majesty's Ministers had taken advantage of the Paris Conferences to consider the question of the state of Italy, but the course which they had adopted in connection with the Emperor of the French had met with the cordial approval of the principal Governments of Europe. With regard to the Persian war, it was very far from being the groundless quarrel which the noble second quite to believe. The capture of Herat, a city of much importance, and surrounded by a territory of unexampled fertility, was one which could not be regarded with indifference when such a contest threatened at once the neutrality and independence of Afghanistan, both of which were necessary to the security of our Indian empire. He regretted much to hear the terms in which Lord Derby had spoken of the conduct of the English authorities in China. The course which had been taken was one which had only been resorted to when all other steps failed when, in fact, the refusal of the Chinese to hold communication with our officials had left the latter no other remedy.

Earl GREY could not characterise the war with Persia as other than unjust and impolitic. It could scarcely be contended that we had the right to dictate the course which an independent nation should pursue in vindicating its interests Yet such, in fact, was the right claimed by this country in the quarrel between Persia and Herat, without our Government even taking the trouble to ascertain which was in the wrong. If it was the bugbear of Russian influence which our Government professed to dread, the late war could hardly have been necessary, since the Government of that country had already [illegible] Russia was anxious to [illegible] that war [illegible] Russia [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

-orse future occasion, his present object being to show how much it was we wasted—how much expense incurred—by this question that followed immediately after the Turkish difficulty, the Russian difficulty. What he asked, was the reason we were on the point of losing one of the very objects for which we went to war? He contended that it was owing to a blunder of our own negotiator, who was a principal member of the Cabinet. Yet, instead of an avowal of the mistake, every means were used to excite the passions of the people of this country against Russia, as if she desired to recede from the treaty. All these difficulties in foreign affairs, which occupied nearly a year, were attributable, he argued, to Ministers—to the question about Bolgrad alone. ## LITERATURE.

THE TRUE THEORY OF REPRESENTATION IN A STATE. By GEORGE HARRIS, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Longman and Co.

This is a very thoughtful publication. Its views are original and comprehensive. Boldly deviating from the beaten track, the author proposes the reconstruction of Parliament rather than its reform. Stare super antiquas vias forms no part of his political creed. With a vigorous hand he tears up the remaining roots of feudal institutions, preferring principles to precedents. Those who are not inclined to adopt all his details will hardly dissent from the fundamentals of his argument—of course excepting those who doggedly resist progress in every form.

The basis of the new system is that "the leading interests of the nation should be represented, not the mere predominance of numbers." Assuming that the House of Lords is coeval with the Norman Conquest, and that the House of Commons was called into existence by Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester in the reign of Henry III., it is plain that the existing relations of classes and interests is widely different from what it was at those remote periods. Parliament is designed to represent all sects in society, property in all its ramifications, opinion in all its phases. Within its walls the voice of every column should be heard, labour is entitled to send its delegates to the national assembly; nor should art, literature, and science be excluded. By such a combination, material wealth, industry, and the intellectual, moral and social condition of the community would be represented, each in its due proportion, and the whole would be harmoniously blended together, and no acquire an unfair preponderance. This at least is the object to be attained; the difficulty is to classify and adjust those coexisting, and occasionally conflicting, interests. Mr. Harris enumerates them in the following order:—1. Virtue; 2. Intelligence; 3. Order; 4. Property; 5. The Professional Interest; 6. The Popular Interest. According to our author, though each member ought to be influenced by Virtue, that element in morals is specially represented in the Episcopal Bench in the House of Lords, and he quotes a sentiment from Lord Eldon justifying the presence of Bishops on that assembly, "not to make the Church a triad, but the State religious." To this part of the scheme the Dissenters will object, unless their several denominations contribute their quota of Virtue to hereditary legislation. Mr. Harris complains of the comparatively recent decision which limited the number of spiritual Peers when the number of Bishops was raised and seeks to justify his complaint by remarking that, "at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries by Henry VIII., the spiritual Lords consisted of twenty-one Lay Lords and Abbots and Priors, besides the Archbishops and Bishops, all together outnumbered the temporal nobility." But here he seems to forget his fundamental principle of "interests, not numbers," and interests are greatly changed since the reign of Henry VIII. Besides, originally, the spiritual Peers did not sit as representatives of Virtue but "per baroniam," hence, also the Conqueror commands the seizure of the uterine brother Odo, he said, "I seize not the Bishop of Bayeux; I seize my vassal, the Earl of Kent."

Special provision is at present very scantily made for the representation of Intelligence in the House of Commons. The Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin among all the learned bodies of the United Kingdom alone are privileged to return members to Parliament, and collectively, they only return six. Mr. Harris, in the list printed at page 61, would confer eight members on Intelligence. He justly complains (p. 30) that "no intellectual test whatever, even the lowest, has ever been required by law either of the voter or member of Parliament." But which, adds "nor has it desirableness been contended for by any of the enlightened advocates of reform," he is in error, for we could mention many who have insisted on an educational test.

The interests of Order are represented in Parliament by all whose welfare depends on the continuance of regular government and the right administration of justice and the large property interest is a great guarantee against the perils of the Constitution being invaded. The representative peerage to be given to the learned bodies would, of course, consist entirely of their intelligence. Of the interest of Property Mr. Harris would give the lead for property in land predominant Parliament and to a less extent for property in personalty. A freeholder of £50 a year would be entitled to a vote, and a householder of £100 a year. The Property qualification Mr. Harris would raise but would reduce its amount. At present the Essex elector pays £40 for his vote, and £1000 in personal property for a city or borough member. We do not perceive what he considers the amount of property for a member representing the learned bodies, but he would clearly fix the qualification at a higher figure than for the county member, for he says at page 60:—"As regards the qualification required of members of Parliament, this ought to consist in all cases of a certain amount of property, so as to give that representative an actual stake in the country." The Professional Interest, as distinguished from the Property Interest, is treated by Mr. Harris as "forming a distinct and independent one of itself," and therefore, seems to demand a separate representation in the national assembly. If we rightly comprehend the enumeration of the new constituencies, as classified at page 61, we find it difficult to separate the learned bodies from the professional bodies by a sufficiently distinctive line of demarcation. We have already, stopping at the "English Royal Academy, given eighty-three members to the learned bodies; but we were aware, when doing so, that some classes so included might be arranged under the head of professional bodies, as attorneys and solicitors, physicians and surgeons and others. We merely hint at this possible confusion, in the hope that Mr. Harris may make the line more palpable in a second edition. In the department of Trades there are only four Chambers of Commerce mentioned as entitled to have representatives, but there are many more of those associations in London alone, and at least as a Chamber of Commerce, Manchester, will be missed.

The Popular Interest is not considered. It consists of all not included in the other five classes, which looks very much like manhood suffrage, but the term is not used. "I am not the deputy of the mob of all power, but I am resolute for dethroning him. I trust that he may be allowed to exercise his fair sway, but I will never consent to subject him into a despot." This is somewhat vague. However, the whole plan appears to us one of checks and balances to prevent the predominance of any interest. But at page 58 Mr. Harris comes down to the real question, should vote for members who are to represent the Popular Interest? "All those men of the country who are to represent the Popular Interest should be men of the age of twenty-one who can read and write, who are gaining an independent livelihood [illegible] rather than as principals, who are [illegible] workmen or labourers and who [illegible] in the country as occupiers of land [illegible] although the amount be rated as low as [illegible] but I am disposed to think that although the right to vote should be confined to those who are [illegible] the right to be elected should be extended to [illegible] A [illegible] the right to vote should be confined to those who are [illegible] the right to be elected should be extended to

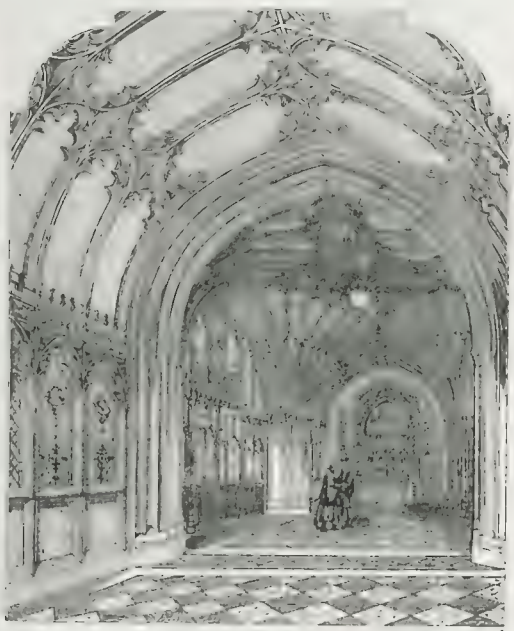
THE PEERS' PORCH.



ENTRANCE HALL.

WE resume our Illustrations of the progress of the New Houses of Parliament towards completion, with the Engraving upon the front page of the present Number, namely,

THE PEERS' STAIRCASE.

The view is taken from the upper landing, on the same level as the whole of the principal rooms, including the Houses of Lords and Commons. This is an elegant approach to the Upper House, having two flights of steps. In form it is nearly square. The ceiling is divided into nine parts, supported by four piers, upon which are rendered pillars, and deeply-recessed mouldings; from the pillars spring the fan groinings of the roof, at whose intersections are some small bosses and shields, all of which are gilded; the space between the groining is coloured azure. It is lighted by two large windows, or five lights each, with rich bold tracery, and enriched with armorial bearings of various nobles—among them those of Nelson and St. Vincent. The side wall is divided, like the windows, into five compartments, in each of which upon gold grounds are emblazoned arms, corresponding with the windows. The floor is of encaustic tiles, in lozenge forms, and varied in pattern. The rise of the steps is also fronted with tiles. The balustrade which surrounds the top of the staircase is divided into compartments, and filled with roses and quatrefoils of very bold design.

The approach to this staircase is from the west front in Old Palace-yard, by the porch (of which we give an illustration), thence through the entrance hall (represented also) and the Peers' hat and cloak room, at the farther end of which, at the side, is seen a rise of three steps, and, turning sharply to the left, we reach the first flight. Bearing again to the left we reach the next ascent. Again bearing to the left, there is a door which leads to the Prince's Chamber, and thence to the House of Lords. There are six other doors (all enriched with stained glass), which lead to various offices and corridors. At night the staircase is lighted by nine lamps, of globose form, surmounted by a regal crown of gilt brass, and suspended from the centre of each division, where the mouldings terminate with a circle.

THE PEERS' PORCH.

This porch is in Old Palace-yard, on the west front of the Palace, facing Poets' Corner; and is of essential service to the exterior appearance of this front of the building. We give a close view of this picturesque porch, with its elaborate fan-groined ceiling and bold centre boss. By this porch the Peers will enter.

ENTRANCE-HALL.

The entrance-hall has its fireplace, and large five-light window enriched with armorial bearings. The ceiling here will strike the stranger on entering by its richness: a lamp, en suite with the rest, will light this hall at night. A screen of oak, pierced with tracery, with a clock in the centre, and filled with stained glass, divides it from

THE PEERS' PRIVATE ENTRANCE.

This apartment has the appearance of a handsome crypt, with its bold piers, arches, and deep mouldings. The entire length is upwards of eighty feet; its width, from wall to wall, about thirty; and its height about fourteen feet. It is divided into three portions in width, and four bays in length, by two rows of piers, three in each row. The bases of these piers are lozenge formed, from the flat of which rise columns whence springs the fan groining. In lieu of a large boss in the centre is suspended a lamp of the cinumbra form, surmounted by a regal crown in gilt brass. Four of these will light the centre avenue of this corridor, or entrance-hall, at night. Daylight is admitted by four windows from Old Palace yard front, and by two from the inner court: these latter are of five lights, the former two lights, each. All are filled with stained glass, with the shield, helmet, crest, and mantle of many noblemen among which are those of John Duke of Marlborough, Arthur Duke of Wellington, George Duke of Albemarle, the Earls of Oxford, Cadogan, Hertford,

Bedford, Sandwich, and others, upon a quarried ground, the middle of each quarry bearing a rose in outline. The fireplace end is divided into compartments; the lower range being filled with the rose, thistle, and shamrock coloured and gilt. the panels below these contain the names of St. George, St. Andrew, and St. Patrick. The upper panels have the arms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, sculptured in strong relief, and coloured and gilt according to the true heraldic style. These arms are each regally crowned with gilded crowns; the moulding lines are also relieved with gold

The floor is all of encaustic tiles, of the same pattern as that on the Peers' Staircase. In this room the members of the House of Lords will deposit their cloaks and overcoats Racks of brass, gilt, and in keeping with the style of furniture already in use in the various rooms of the palace, will be placed at intervals along the room.

We agree with the art-critic in the 'Companion to the Almanack' that this lobby or entrance-room "is an excellent example of the artistic treatment of a low room so as to negative what would otherwise be the deficiency of height. The effect of the piers and arches which are introduced for this end, and the grouping of the wall decorations and chimney-piece, cannot be too highly praised. Few architects have shown the same artistic power as Sir Charles Barry, through many different mediums of style, above the trammels of which he has ever risen superior."

BAS-RELIEFS IN THE PRINCE'S CHAMBER, being a continuation of the series of historic tableaux which enrich the walls of this elegant apartment.

LADY JANE GREY AND HER TUTOR.

The first here engraved represents Lady Jane Grey at her studies, the incident being her old tutor, Dr. Roger Ascham, discovering his pupil, and asking her how it is that she should be studying her books whilst her relations and friends are enjoying the sports of the field. She is here represented, in her meek way, listening; or it may be just answering her tutor's interrogation. The costume of the period has been adhered to in the treatment of the subject. The arrangement of the folds in Lady Jane's dress is simple and graceful. The walls of the room are hung with tapestry. The suspended curtain in the left-hand corner is not in keeping with arrased apartments of the period of this incident But the group is a clever composition.

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS LEAVING THE SHORES OF FRANCE

In this composition, the lovely Queen is taking a last look at the French coast from the poop of a vessel on which she is reclining; behind her are two female attendants, and behind them is the flapping sail and sturdy mast. A young page also reclines listlessly on a cushion, at the foot of the tapestried dais upon which the Queen is seated. A sentinel stands somewhat lower than the other figures, and is evidently watching the receding shore with as much earnestness as his Royal mistress.

THE DEATH OF SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.

This is the well-known touching incident of the gallant and accomplished Sir Philip Sidney refusing a cup of cold water, which had been brought to quench his thirst, in favour of one of his poor wounded soldiers, whom he declared required it more than himself. This noble act is well told in this bas-relief. The wounded General is seated at the foot of a tree, supported by a halberdier; two are bearing the body of the wounded man whose case had called forth the generous act of commiseration from the noble-minded Sidney.

THE GREAT CLOCK.

The history of this already famed Clock dates as far back as 1844. We have, however, only space for the leading details

The design was furnished Mr. Dent by Mr. Edmund Beckett Denison, Q.C., &c., who has devoted much of his valuable time to the study of clock and watch improvements

The clock has been going for upwards of four years in its present position. The wheels—with the exception of the escape-wheel, weighing half-an-ounce—are of cast iron, cast with the teeth. The large wheels of the going parts are 27 inches in diameter, and contain 180 teeth; the barrel is 23 inches in diameter; the second-wheel is 12 inches in diameter. The width of the frame for the striking machinery is nearly 5 feet; and the bevelled wheels are 16 inches in diameter. The pendulum is 15 feet in length, and weighs 662 lbs. It is composed of an iron rod inclosed in a tube of zinc; the iron is pierced with holes to allow the circulation of air, and also of contraction and expansion. The escapement used by Mr. Denison is a remontoir, or gravity escapement, being more independent of the causes of vibration for the position this clock will occupy. Wire rope has been adopted, as being more economical and occupying less space. The winding wheels for the hours and quarters are of the same size as the large wheels. There is a clever piece of mechanism for stopping the winding when the clock is about to strike. The winding of each of the striking parts occupies two hours. The second-wheels are rather more than 18 inches in diameter, and contain 105 teeth. The great wheels of the striking parts, the barrels, and cam wheels, weigh 17 cwt., and are 38 inches in diameter. The levers are 19 inches in length.

The weight of the hour-bell is 14 or 15 tons; the hammer, 4 cwt.; the largest quarter-bell, 5½ tons (about the size of the great bell of St. Paul's). The frame for supporting this mammoth of clock machinery is like the girders used at the Crystal Palace, 19 inches in depth, and 16½ feet in length. The dials are to be 22 feet in diameter, the minute-hand, on account of its weight and having to move nearly seven inches every half-minute, will require nearly twenty times the force to drive it as the hour hand.

The clock is capable of going eight and a half days, the striking part seven and a half days.

has been engraved from a photograph by Mr. Freeman De la Motte. For the above details we are indebted to the present Mr. Dent, and his manager, Mr. Smith. A more copious description of this, the largest and most successful piece of clock machinery yet produced, will be found in the Engineer, for Oct. 31, 1856.

MR. CORT'S CLAIMS.—The following is an extract from the eighth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," by Mr William Fairbairn, F.R.S. "It would be a difficult task to enumerate all the services rendered by Mr. Cort to the iron industry of the country, sufficiently to express our sympathies with the descendants and relatives of a man to whose mechanical inventions we owe so much of our national greatness. It is, perhaps, not generally known that Mr Henry Cort expended a fortune or upwards of £20,000 in perfecting his inventions for puddling iron and rolling it into bars or plates, that he was robbed of the fruit of his discoveries by the villany of officials in a high department of the Government, and that he was ultimately left to starve by the apathy and selfishness of an ungrateful country. When these facts are known, and it has been ascertained that Mr. Henry Cort's inventions have conferred an amount of wealth on the country equivalent to £600,000,000, and have given maintenance and employment to 600,000 of the working population of the land for the last three or four generations, we are surely justified in referring to services of such vast importance, and in advocating the principle that substantial proofs of the nation's gratitude should be afforded to rescue from penury and want the descendants of such a benefactor."

THE CAPTURE OF BUSHIRE.

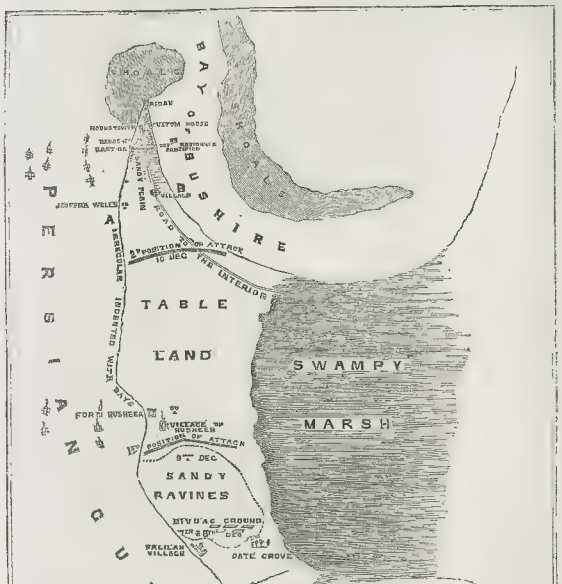
The following letter is from an officer of the fleet who, from his local knowledge of Bushire, was attached to the army as guide:

CAMP, NEAR BUSHIRE, Dec. 10th, 1856.

I have just time to send you a few lines describing the march of the army from Halilah Bay to this place. Shortly after the boats had cleared away the enemy from the date groves, near the place selected for the disembarkation, the 64th Regiment, portions of the 2nd Europeans, 4th Rifles, and 20th Native Infantry, landed on the 7th safely, and myself amongst them. I immediately set out in search of the wells, and was delighted to find that they were within the position taken up by the troops. About a couple of hours afterwards six guns were landed, with their full complement of horses, and the force was put in motion towards a very large date grove, about two miles from the beach, where the men were tolerably well sheltered, but in which water could not be found. While our reconnoitring with some of the staff, and pointing out the places about the camp, an orderly came from the General, requesting me to proceed with a detachment of the Rifles in search of water. Away I went, and was not long in finding out some dozen wells, where sufficient water could be got for a much larger force. I reported to General Stalker the result, and was thanked for my trouble. After the men had rested about a couple of hours the camp broke up, and commenced moving towards the high ground above the village of Halilah. When the troops had arrived within sight of the village, the head man came running out to the General in a dreadful state of trepidation, kissed the nose of the General's horse, and went on as if he was out of his wits. The General told me to explain to him that he was not to be afraid of any one, as he would be taken care of, and a picket stationed at the village. I begged leave to proceed to the village and assure the people that they would be protected. When I got there I told them that they must go and bring their families in, and make themselves comfortable; and that whatever they had for sale in the shape of fowls, cattle, milk, eggs, &c., we would be very glad to buy from them. I succeeded in getting some fowls, and purchased some barley and straw for the cavalry.



PLAN OF THE OPERATIONS AGAINST BUSHIRE.

We bivouacked on the ground that night, and as I had only my Persian cloak I could not sleep for the cold. The men scoured the country for firewood, and made themselves as comfortable as they could under the circumstances. We remained there all the 8th, waiting for the remainder of the force, artillery, &c., and bivouacked again on the ground with as little benefit as before. However, I had plenty to do in the daytime and that kept me from thinking of sleep at all.

By 7 a.m. I had a small piece of beefsteak, and left with the advanced guard for Bushire. I was fortunate in picking out the best possible road for the party, which consisted of about 150 of the 3rd Light Cavalry, two guns, and about 200 of the 2nd Europeans. All went well till we neared a village about a mile and a half from old Reshire Fort. I fancied I saw a large body of men in that fort, and galloped into the village with two of the 3rd after us lest any of the enemy should be amongst the houses. I found the whole of the people in the market place and rode up to the chief. I asked him, first if any of the enemy were in his village? He swore by Allah that there were none. I then asked who the men were in the old fort, when he told me they were Turguinans. I asked their number, when he told me that the place was full, but did not know how many. He said there were no guns, so back I went as rapidly as possible to Captain Wray with the intelligence. I was told to point where the artillery could get it from; and the troops moved to about 600 yards from the fort. We prepared for action, when bang went a bullet at one of the officers who were near close to a lot of houses on the left of the fort. The enemy were in possession of these houses. Luckily they missed the man they were aimed at, and a shell was sent in amongst them. No sooner did the shell from the gun fire than, with a yell, the enemy fired from all the windows, exposing our rear and a small space on our right. Down went the guns, and we were ordered to the firing line—when bang—whurr—bang—whurr seems to be full of bullets, but thank God! I was not hit once. This was the first time I had been under fire, and as I had only my sword with me I had to wait patiently as a sort of target. I feel truly thankful to the Lord for my preservation that passed over I began to wonder what I could do to observing a poor wretch crawling along within a dozen yards, I rode up to him, and asked where he was hit? He told me he had a ball in the ankle. So I dismounted, put him on my horse, and took him to the surgeon, who was fully employed behind a wall a few yards further on. It was still the confounded ping—ping—bang—whurr, but they, somehow or other, did not bother me very much. Back went a heavy gun, and a cheer from our men followed. The heavy gun was from the navy, and soon were seen the shells popping into the fort. By this time four guns of the artillery were at work, and another cheer was heard. I looked round and saw the General behind me with the remainder of the force. The artillery by this time had cleared the houses of the enemy; and the cavalry, as well as I could see from the rising ground, were stretching away down to the right to intercept the enemy should they attempt to make for Bushire. Stormers were told off three. The 64th and 20th Native Infantry moved to the right of the fort; the 2nd Europeans to the centre; and the General, Staff, Rifles, and myself to the left. At this moment I saw the enemy come pouring out of the fort close to the sea, and saw that the 64th had just rounded the ruins. I knew the ground well, and saw that the enemy would escape; so I galloped to the front of the Rifles—the confounded ping, ping, still going on—and pointed out where they could harass the enemy. Colonel Trevelyan, of the Artillery, then came up to me, and asked where he could get two of his guns in a good position. The enemy by this time were underneath the cliffs on the edge of which we were riding; and as these cliffs were only about forty or fifty feet high. I could easily see what sort of people they were, and satisfied myself that they were the Turguinans—a tribe who are proverbially brave. The Rifles committed great havoc amongst them; and when the guns got to the position pointed out by their commanding officer, Colonel Trevelyan, the poor wretches were punished most fearfully. Again, as many of them had escaped round the cliffs, and would get to our rear, that officer begged of me to find out General Stalker, and get a body of cavalry sent to defend the baggage, and assist the rearguard, supposed to be on their way from Halilah by the same road that we came. My horse was so tired that I could not take him up the steep sides of the redoubt, but left him in charge of a sepoy, and went into the fort. Bodies were lying in all directions, and there was such an immense number of people in it belonging to our own troops that I could not find the General, but got a glimpse of Colonel Younghusband, to whom I stated Colonel Trevelyan's request. He gave me a pencil note, and off I went in search of the cavalry; but find them I could not. At last I met Major Hill, who went along with me and got some 150 of the 3rd Light Cavalry to go along the road to Halilah—I acting as guide. Off we went, and were joined by a couple of horse artillery guns; but the horses of every one were so fatigued that we could only walk, with a little bit of a trot now and then. After passing through the village we came upon the body of a poor camp follower who had been taken by the enemy and decapitated. As we ascended the ridge, some 300 or so of the enemy, who had been in the redoubt, and who had crossed the high ground, were observed wending their way slowly towards their homes in the hills in a wretched plight. It was impossible to follow them, as the cliffs were in many places sixty to seventy feet high, with immense ravines here and there. About halfway to Halilah we met some of the Poonah horse, and halted until it was ascertained that the last man had come up, and that all were safe. I had a weary ride back to the bivouac of the army; and I experienced great kindness. I could scarcely get away from the officers of the 3rd, who, I grieve to say, lost their Colonel on the beach below the cliffs, already mentioned by me. I was told that a villain who had been spared by him shot him; and that the cavalry revenged his death.

When I reached the General's tent both horse and myself were exhausted. I had the satisfaction of finding that the General had seen my conduct, and, in fact, I had scarcely spoken half a-dozen words, when Colonel Younghusband ran out and took hands warmly with me, and hoped I had not been hurt, thanking me for what I had done. I was so glad that I had been of service, that I could scarcely answer him.

I had some supper, and lay down on the ground in my cloak, and had just fallen asleep, when the alarm was given to arms. Little rest could be had that night, and the morning brought a most painful sight—the burial of Colonel Malet, of the Colonel of the 64th (who had been killed at the fort), and one officer of the 20th Native Infantry, with several men. On the 10th, after a slight refreshment, the force moved on, when a very heavy cannonade was heard in the direction of Bushire. When we got within sight we had the satisfaction of finding that the Indian Navy was engaged with the batteries in and outside the town.

A strong redoubt was observed full of men, but evidently, from the fire of the vessels, they were induced to leave it. On reaching it, I found one Persian soldier lying in the trench with the top of his head taken off by a cannon-ball.

We kept nearing the town but, after some parley, it surrendered. Several horsemen endeavoured to force their way through the line, but were all, with the exception of two, killed. One of them I had the pleasure to disarm of his matchlock, pouch, &c., and some person or other took possession of his horse. I presented the matchlock to the General, which he accepted, much to my satisfaction. Here ends my narrative.

FRENCH OPINION ON THE PERSIAN WAR.—Persia, in obtaining possession of the town and principality of Herat, has violated the Treaty of 1853, concluded between England and Persia. The latter Power alleges, in excuse for its conduct, that the terms of this treaty ought to have been submitted by England to the Prince of Herat. Now such an omission, if it took place, does not in the slightest degree affect the obligation of the treaty, for it was in the interest of the security of her neighbours, the Afghans, and of her Indian territory, that England stipulated that Herat should neither be attacked nor occupied, unless in the event of a foreign invasion. But no loyal discussion or moral engagements are possible with some barbarian Governments, whose only aim is derive arms from civilisation for the profit of despotism. England has on her side in this question that right and good faith which did not exist in her campaign against the Afghans in 1839. It does not suffice to be enabled to say, "I draw the sword in defence of my right;" it is necessary to add, as Englandmen now add, "and in defending this right I wound that of no other Power." It is not necessary to repeat that we form the most lively wishes for the confirmation of the pacific intelligence brought by the telegraph; but we must candidly admit that we do not rely on that intelligence. A genuine and solid peace can only be established on the basis of the Treaty of 1853, and we suppose that the occupation of the southern commercial ports has sufficed to produce so prompt and auspicious a result.—Siecle.

WARNING TO BOXKEEPERS.—The French Minister of State has written a circular to the managers of the theatres in Paris complaining that the boxkeepers are in the habit of stating falsely that places which it is desired to reserve on the chance of getting extra prices on particular nights are retained by the Minister of State or his household. The Minister affirms that neither himself nor anybody belonging either directly or indirectly to his office ever take a box at a theatre on any other terms than the general public, and desires that these misrepresentations may not be made in future.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE AMERICAN CHESS MONTHLY.—Tribner and Co., London. This new candidate for public favour has just reached us, and fully deserves a passing word of notice and encouragement in foreign and even in the Chess Monthly is to resemble the late Chess Player's Chronicle, and the present Berlin Schachzeitung but, as the programme informs us, "it is intended to occupy a much larger space than is usual with Historical and Literary Chess; this will include biographies of eminent players and classic writers, critical reviews and bibliographical notices of Chess works, illustrations of the game at particular periods and in different countries, anecdotes, tales, and so forth. All this is very well in a prospectus, and must be taken quantum valeat. We hardly ever knew a Chess periodical which was not heralded by a flourish, declaratory of the projector's intention to devote a considerable portion of its columns to articles illustrative of the history and literature of the game but somehow, after the first few numbers, the appearances of such articles has always seen like the eternally-quoted "angels visits" "few and far between." The truth is, nearly everything that can be said on the historical side of the question has been repeated over and over again. It is much the same with regard to Chess literature and defunct celebrities in the game. The staple pabulum, then, after all for a publication of this description must be original games and problems, and so long as a good supply of these (of first-class excellence) is kept up, the public will be reasonably content to abide by a very moderate proportion of historic and literary Chess information. The opening number of the Chess Monthly contains an amusing account of the once-famous Chess Automaton, which was destroyed in the great fire at Philadelphia, July, 1854; a humorous set of Anagrams, based on Staunton, Kling and Horwitz, known to the Chess world under his pseudonym of Cheltenham Selenus; a sprinkling of Chess Aphorisms; a short notice of American Chess, and a few good Games and Problems of which last, affording as they do a favourable proof of the advance the science is making in the United States, and a fair sample of the sort of Chess to be looked for from the new magazine, we shall present a few specimens to our Chess column from time to time.

PROBLEM No. 677.

WHITE.
White to play, and mate in five moves.

CHESS IN PARIS

The Chess season in Paris has been brilliantly inaugurated. During the past month the well-known German player, Harrwitz, has been twice engaged—once by Prince Napoleon, and then by the Count Casabianca, to exhibit before an illustrious assemblage his extraordinary powers in what is called blindfold Chess play. On each occasion he conducted two games simultaneously against opponents of no mean ability, and on each occasion was victorious; of the four games played winning three, and making a drawn battle of the fourth. The following are the games contested at the first sitting—his antagonist in the one being Prince Antoine Bonaparte, and in the other the Duke of Brunswick:

GAME I.
(Sicilian Opening)

| WHITE (Mr. Harrwitz). | BLACK (Prince Napoleon). | WHITE (Mr. Harrwitz). | BLACK (Prince Napoleon). |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1. P to K 4th | P to Q B 4th | 16. P to Q R 5th (e) | Q Kt to Q 2nd |
| 2. P to Q 4th | P to K 3rd (a) | 17. Kt to Q R 4th | P to B 4th |
| 3. P to Q 5th | P to K 4th | 18. Q R to Q R 3rd | K to K R 2nd (f) |
| 4. P to K B 4th | P to Q 3rd | 19. Q takes K Kt P | K Kt to K 1st |
| 5. K Kt to K B 3rd | Q B to K Kt 5th | 20. Q to K R 4th (g) | K to K Kt 2nd |
| 6. K B to Q 3rd | P to K Kt 3rd (b) | 21. Q R to Q Kt 3rd | Q Kt to K R sq |
| 7. P takes P | B takes Kt | 22. Q R takes P | K to K R 3rd (h) |
| 8. Q takes B | P takes P | 23. B to K 2nd | K to K Kt 4th |
| 9. Castles | P to K B 3rd | 24. Kt to Q Kt 6th | K Kt to Kt 3rd |
| 10. Kt to Q B 3rd | P to Q R 3rd | 25. Q R takes Q Kt | Kt takes Q |
| 11. P to Q R 4th | P to Q 3rd (c) | 26. Q takes Q | K to K Kt 3rd |
| 12. K to R sq | P to K R 4th | 27. Q R takes P | Q R to K Kt sq |
| 13. Q to K Kt 3rd | K Kt to K 2nd | 28. P to K R 4th | K R to K Kt 4th |
| 14. Q B to K 3rd | B to K R 3rd | 29. K to R 3rd | K R to K 2nd |
| 15. B takes B (d) | K R takes B | And White gave mate in two moves | |

(a) It is better to take the Pawn.
(b) Black has already a bad game, and this does not improve it.
(c) Threatening to advance the Q B Pawn, and, if White then took it, to win the Bishop by checking with his Queen at her Bishop's 4th.
(d) The spectators at first stared, as it would now take the Q B Pawn with the Bishop, but it appears to us very questionable whether the attack obtained would have compensated for such a sacrifice. At all events, considering that Mr. Harrwitz was conducting another game without sight of the board at the moment, it must be admitted that he exercised a wise discretion in choosing the surest road to victory.
(e) The importance of this apparently insignificant move will be manifest presently.
(f) This, we presume, was an oversight.
(g) Decidedly preferable to taking the K R Pawn.
(h) Black's game is irretrievable, it is, therefore, of no moment what he plays.

GAME II.
(Evans's Gambit.)

| WHITE (Mr. Harrwitz.) | BLACK (Duke of Bruns.) | WHITE (Mr. Harrwitz.) | BLACK (Duke of Bruns.) |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1. P to K 4th | P to K 4th | 14. Q to K 3rd | Q Kt to K 3rd |
| 2. K Kt to K B 3rd | Q Kt to Q B 3rd | 15. B takes Kt | Q takes B |
| 3. K B to Q B 4th | K B to Q B 4th | 16. P to K 4th | P to K B 4th |
| 4. P to Q Kt 4th | K B takes Kt P | 17. Q Kt to Q B 3rd | K B takes h1 |
| 5. P to Q B 3rd | K B to Q R 4th | 18. Q takes B | Kt to K B 3rd |
| 6. P to K 5th | P takes P | 19. P to Q 7th (ch) | Q B takes P |
| 7. Q to Q Kt 3rd | Q to K 2nd | 20. Q R to K sq | Kt to K 4th |
| 8. Castles | P to K R 3rd | 21. Q to Q Kt 4th | P to Q Kt 4th |
| 9. Q B P takes P | P to Q 3rd | 22. Q to Q R 4th (b) | P to K Kt 4th |
| 10. P to K 5th | Q to Q 2nd | 23. Q R to Q 8th | P takes P |
| 11. Q B P takes P | Q to K to Q sq | 24. Q to Q B 7th | Q R to Q B sq |
| 12. P takes Q P | P to Q B 3rd (a) | 25. Q B P takes R P | K R to K R sq |
| 13. K Kt to K 5th | Q to R B 4th | 26. Q R to Q B 8th | R takes K Kt P |
| | | (c) | (ch) (d) |

And draws the game by perpetual check.

(a) It is very evident that Black would have lost a Piece if he had taken Pawn with Pawn.
(b) It was suggested afterwards Mr. Harrwitz might have played advantageously as follows—
25. Kt to K Kt 6th — P to Q B 4th
26. P takes P — P takes Kt
27. P to Q B 8th, with a splendid game.
(c) With the intent of moving away the Kt and opening the files with the Rook
(d) A clever and unexpected move, changing in an instant the whole aspect of the game, and forcing drawn battle, let White play as he will. To effect such a result is equal to winning many games.

ANNUAL MEETING AND SOIREE OF THE MANCHESTER CHESS CLUB.—The annual soirée of the Manchester Chess Club was held on the 21st ult., at Worsenden's, in Market-street, to which theclub has removed its members there assembling a strong array. Members of the club and their friends. Among the strangers present we observed the Rev. S. Burnell, of Warrington; Mr. Cinley and friends, from Ashton under-Lyne; Mr. Chadwick, the Rev. Mr. Owen, and a number of several Manchester gentlemen. The first game played in the afternoon was a consultation game, in which Mr. Kalli and Mr. Francis encountered Mr. A. Fisher and Mr. King. The former had the move, and played the interesting and adventurous Evans' gambit opening; but, after maintaining a strong attack, they unluckily made a move which enabled their opponents to win their Queen, and so brought the combat to a sudden close. Another consultation game was commenced between Mr. Pinder and Mr. Hamel, of Glasgow (formerly resident in Manchester), against Mr. Cohen, Mr. Prince, and Mr. Gregson. This partie, which was very equally conducted, had reached an interesting climax when the time arrived to adjourn to supper. Many spectators were engaged in observing these games; while others were carrying on combats between themselves. Mr. Burnell had among the number. Upwards of forty gentlemen sat down to supper, under the presidency of Mr. C. A. Duval, the vice chair being filled by Mr. Hasché. The usual loyal and other toasts were proposed, that of "The strangers" being responded to by Mr. Chadwick, who gave "Success to the Manchester Chess Club;" to which Mr. Duval replied in a highly humorous strain. The club, on removal to its present central position, receives a considerable accession of members, and as among the strongest in numbers, and it is believed in average play also, of any Chess association in the provinces.

MAGNUS'S SLATE BILLIARD TABLES, the only one that (having enamelled slate frames and solid slate legs) are suitable for exportation. He likewise has one in the drawing-room at Osborne, the Queen's residence in the Isle of Wight; Sebastopol, and they are patronised by noblemen in general, as well as by the most scientific players
See Report by the Jurors at the Great Exhibition, 1851 "Of all the objects manufactured by this exhibitor the Billiard Table is perhaps the most remarkable, as being entirely impervious to climate unmoistened of any other material. To this exhibitor the Jury have had no hesitation in awarding the Prize Medal, in acknowledgment of his honorable and useful contrivances and applications.
Although these tables are immeasurably superior to all others, Mr Magnus is now able to supply them for less than tables with mahogany frames.—Pimlico Slate Works, 39 and 40, Upper Belgrave-place, Pimlico, S.W.

MAGNUS'S ENAMELLED SLATE CHIMNEYPIECES, Table Tops, Cabinet Stoves, Billiard and Bagatelle Tables, Chiffoniers, Baths, Washstand Tops, Altar Tablets, Mural Tablets, Urinals, Cisterns, Flower Pots, Vases, Dairy Fittings, &c., obtained the Medal of the Society of Arts, the Prize Medal of the Great Exhibition of 1851, and two Prize Medals at the Paris Exhibition of 1855. Much cheaper, handsomer, and more durable than Marble. Mr Osborne has had Mr Magnus's Slate Works, 39 and 40, Upper Belgrave-place, Pimlico, S.W.

MAGNUS'S CABINET-FORMED STOVE, with open fire, double flue, and hot-air chamber. Decidedly the most elegant, economical, and convenient stove that has been introduced to the public. In the drawing-room it forms an exquisite piece of furniture, and in the hall it is a handsome ornament. It is composed of fire-stone and enamelled slate, instead of iron. Can be had movable on casters, and is suitable to every apartment and to all styles of mansions, churches, &c.

THE ALEXANDRE HARMONIUM AT SIX GUINEAS.
ALEXANDRE and SON have made the Harmonium at the lowest price possible, to bring the instrument within the means of all classes. It is au au Oak Case, with Four Octaves, is also admirably adapted for Private Houses and for Chapels, and is INDISPENSABLE TO THE SCHOOL-ROOM.
The Six-Guinea Harmonium will be taken in exchange for any of the more expensive descriptions, without loss or diminution
Alexandre and Son obtained the Role Medal of Honour at the Great Exhibition at Paris, 1855. Their Harmoniums have been pronounced the best by Rossini, Auber, Adam, Thalberg, Liszt, &c., and by the Professors of the Conservatoire de Paris.
The more expensive Harmoniums range from 10 to 55 guineas. Those are brought to the greatest perfection, and are equally adapted to the
TO ANY
ACCOMPANIMENT TO THE VOICE OR PIANOFORTE.
Messrs. Chappell have just received a number of Alexandre's celebrated
HARMONIUM PIANOFORTES,
which combine the excellence of both instruments. The two can be used in combination by the same performer, or each instrument is perfect in itself Price from 40 to 150 guineas.
An Immense Stock of
PIANOFORTES BY THE BEST MAKERS,
from Twenty Guineas upwards, which can be thoroughly recommended and warranted
Messrs. Chappell and Co. have just opened a number of
NEW ROOMS FOR INSTRUMENTS,
enabling the purchaser to select a Pianoforte or Harmonium from the largest Stock in London, and to try the merits of the various instruments side by side.
Full descriptive Lists of Harmoniums and of Pianofortes will be sent on application to

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE, price Fifty Guineas.—This instrument has unlike the ord.nary Cottages (Parisian) Three Strings and the fullest Grand compass of Seven Octaves. It is strengthened in every part, enables means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bichord Grand. The case is of the most elegant construction, is rosewood, the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to ensure its standing well in time. Chappell and Co. especially invite the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the Foreign Model, feeling assured that no Pianoforte for the money can be produced in England

THE CHINESE WAR.

THE first intelligence of the bombardment of Canton took the public by surprise. In the absence of authentic information, those estimable persons who prize above all things the truly British privilege of abusing the Government and its functionaries, at home and abroad, jumped to the conclusion that the Chinese must have been right in all that they had done, or refused to do; and that, consequently, the bombardment was a shameful and brutal massacre. It was not only the Peace-at-all-price party, who seem never to be so happy as when they are carrying on a paper war against their own countrymen, who indulged themselves in these fierce invectives, but a considerable number of more reasonable politicians were ready to condemn Sir John Bowring, Mr. Consul Parkes, Admiral Seymour, and Lord Palmerston, for precipitation and cruelty. The indictment gradually shaped itself into several distinct counts or heads, which a person no less eminent than the Earl of Derby undertook to set forth in his place in Parliament, and which may be thus classified.—Firstly, that the Arrow lorcha—the original cause of the whole dispute—was not under the protection of the British flag when boarded by the Chinese, her register, or right of trading, under that flag having expired, and that, consequently, the war was unjust and wicked. Secondly, that the offer of Governor Yeh to restore to British authority all the crew of the lorcha, with the exception of the alleged pirate and his father, was a sufficient satisfaction of British demands; and that a bombardment under such circumstances was wanton aggression and unpardonable cruelty. Thirdly, that, even if this concession on the part of Yeh was not all that might have been expected, it would have been wiser and more humane to have accepted it rather than resort to hostilities. There was yet another count in the indictment, which grew out of the previous three, to the effect that the whole of the proceedings were but a pretext to enforce compliance on the part of the people of Canton with a treaty which they had repudiated; and that the free admission into the city claimed by our traders would not tend to the advantage of British commerce, or the increase of legitimate British influence in China.

The publication of the official correspondence of our functionaries in China with the Home Government, which has just been presented to Parliament, will enable all Englishmen who are jealous of the honour of their country, and who desire that it never should be engaged in any war that is not only just but inevitable, to form a correct opinion upon the whole of this unhappy dispute. We believe the correspondence will satisfy all reasonable men, who look upon the case without prejudice, and who do not bedim the ordinary clearness of their vision by the foregone conclusion that the British Government must necessarily be wrong whenever it fires a gun, except upon parade, or as a holiday salute, that our officials in the East had no alternative but to act as they did, and that they performed a stern duty with remarkable forbearance and good feeling. Taking the indictment under the four heads above set forth, the public will be enabled to gather upon each sufficient information to justify it in granting to the Government, a full acquittal for the past, and cordial support for the future.

We shall take the charges seriatim. In the first place, it is clearly proved that the Arrow had legally obtained from Sir John Bowring at Hong-Kong a title to bear the British flag and to enjoy all its protection; and that, although the date of the register had actually expired, the document was legally in force until the vessel returned to Hong-Kong to renew it. It is further proved that the name of the vessel was inscribed upon its stern in British as well as Chinese characters;—that the British flag was flying when the Arrow was boarded by the Chinese;—that the captain, an Englishman, who had accidentally gone on board another English craft, the Dart, at the distance of fifty yards from his own vessel, distinctly saw the British ensign hauled down by the Chinese;—and that his evidence is corroborated by other Englishmen as well as Chinese. Lastly, it is proved that, although the registry of the Arrow was actually out of date, it was legally in force;—and that the Chinese authorities were not aware of the fact of its expiry until some days after the outrage had been committed. So much for the first count of the indictment.

As regards the second, that Yeh offered sufficient amends to satisfy the outraged honour of the British flag, and the unjustifiable breach of solemn treaty, we do not expect that public opinion will be quite so clear. It is difficult to say what is sufficient apology and reparation in cases of insult; for much depends upon the character of the aggression. The ungracious and tardy offer of Yeh to deliver up ten men out of twelve whom he had illegally seized was a begging of the question. The Chinese only alleged that one man was a pirate. Why should they have been permitted to retain two? And if the one man were accused of piracy, Consul Parkes, if applied to in the proper manner defined by treaty, would have been bound to deliver him up to the Chinese authorities to be dealt with according to Chinese law; so that Yeh had not the shadow of a justification for the retention of the supposed delinquent. It is obvious that under such circumstances the British authorities would have stultified themselves if they had accepted such an apology as this, which, while it would have settled nothing for the future, would have degraded and weakened them in the mean time, and rendered them powerless in case of any future misunderstanding with the Chinese.

As regards the third point, it is sufficient to allege that severity is not necessarily cruelty, but may be the truest mercy in the end. To put up with insult is wise and Christian to a certain extent, both on the part of nations and of individuals. Great Britain wisely and considerately did not resent the insult inflicted upon it by the Government of the United States in dismissing Mr. Crampton, because it had no reason to believe that the insult was malicious and premeditated, or that it would lead to future and increased misunderstanding. But the insult offered by Yeh was one of a long series. It was proof positive of malice and insolence. It would, if submitted to, have inevitably led to other insults grosser and more intolerable. The whole intercourse of the British and Chinese at Canton was of a most uncomfortable and explosive character. It was wise to take advantage of the wrong done by the Chinese, in order to stop future aggression and dry up the sources of quarrel. No one can say that Governor Yeh was not allowed ample time for deliberation. If he had had the slightest wisdom, the slightest good feeling, the slightest regard for the sanctity of a treaty which his Government, and consequently himself as its administrator, had solemnly undertaken to observe, he would have at least accorded to Admiral Seymour the personal interview which was demanded. Had he done so there would have been no bombardment. Everything shows how unwillingly this ultima ratio was resorted to both by our civil and military authorities; and everything proves in the same degree that Yeh—a man who is as bloody-minded as he is obdurate—was entirely to blame for all the evil consequences that have resulted.

As regards the last point, we may leave it to the English at Canton—and not to a Lord born in the pre-scientific age, and who, when a Minister for the Colonies, declared Demerara to be an island—to decide whether or not any advantage would accrue to British commerce from the admission of British subjects into the city of Canton. British merchants, if they know anything, know their own interests. Treaty accords them the right of free ingress and egress at Canton; and, if they can calculate the advantages derivable from it, their opinion must have due weight at home—far more weight than any opinion formed by the leaders, or by the rank and file, of her Majesty's Opposition in either House of Parliament, or of those persons out of Parliament who make it a point to disbelieve in the truth and patriotism of their own countrymen whenever a misunderstanding arises in any part of the world.

We trust, for the sake of the Chinese, and for the sake of humanity, that the war will speedily be brought to a conclusion. But, if the case should be otherwise, the correspondence shows that our officials have neither acted illegally, nor hastily, nor cruelly. Parliament, we have no doubt, will ratify their policy, and support them in all the ulterior measures that may be necessary to give effect to it.

FEROUK KHAN, THE PERSIAN ENVOY TO THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH.

It was stated in some of the French papers that his Excellency Feroukh Khan was the first Persian Ambassador who had made his appearance in Paris for nearly a century and a half. This is a mistake. Envoys from the Shah of Persia have been received at the French Court at various times during the present century. Upon the preceding page we have engraved a Portrait of the Envoy now in Paris, sketched from a miniature painted by a Persian artist. His costume consists of a green tunic, crossed by a blue ribbon; a cashmere pelisse, lined with fur, and having on each side a diamond aigrette; his sword and belt are also studded with brilliants; and he wears suspended from his neck a portrait of the Shah of Persia, set in diamonds.

The movements of the Envoy in Paris have from time to time been recorded in our Journal. His Excellency was present at a magnificent ball at the Tuileries on the 29th ult., and divided the honours of the evening with the Russian Prince Yusupoff, whose display of diamonds fully rivals that of the representative of the Shah. Feroukh Khan was also the guest of the evening on the 4th inst. at a brilliant entertainment given at the Hôtel de Ville. He was attended by the principal members of his suite. After being formally introduced to Madame Haussmann, he was conducted through the ball-room to a reserved salon, from which he presently emerged, and went through the principal rooms, with the superb and tasteful decorations of which he professed himself much struck.

With regard to the object of the mission of the Persian Envoy, Feroukh Khan has, it seems, full power to negotiate with England, and is in communication with Lord Cowley (the Persians are abstemious at table, and may safely be welcomed to the embassy), and therefore Russia, true to her game of deception, is filling the Continental journals with her protests against the exorbitant demands of England; and, it is said, by instructing her Generals to make demonstrations along the Caspian Sea. The Shah has not studied under his Russian friends in vain, and has issued an account of the capture of Bushire, which fell, says his Majesty, "without a blow from the invaders, the defenders having had no orders to resist." Apropos thereof it seems, that towards the end of the war, even the Russians, comprehended the ludicrous side of their Government notifications, and used to make caricatures upon the subject. One of these pictures represented St. Peter keeping the celestial gate, and various soldiers of all nations who had fallen in the campaign coming to him for admission. A troop of French come, state their nation, and are sent in. Then some English come, and the saint, rather grudgingly, lets them in also. Some slain Turks are recommended to apply at some other door. Then comes a great column of Russians. "Who are you all?" "Ten thousand Russians who were killed at Inkermann." "Get out with you, you scoundrels and impostors!" shouts St. Peter (still irascible); "do you think I don't read the Russian papers, and that I don't know that not quite five hundred were killed there? Be off with you!"

The latest intelligence received from Paris states that Feroukh Khan was expected to leave that capital for London in a few days; where, adds the correspondent, "if we can credit the accounts just received from Persia, his task will not be difficult."

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, Thursday.

At the Palace of the Elysée preparations are going on for the reception of the Emperor and Empress, who are expected to pass the spring there, in consequence of the necessity of repairing the Pavillon de Flore and other parts of the Tuileries, which for a considerable time have been in bad condition. It is reported that the explosion which formerly took place of the powder-magazine at Grenoble had something to do with the crazy state of a large portion of the Palace, especially along the quay. Whatever may have been the cause of the damage, it is certain that the necessity of vast repairs, if not of reconstruction, becomes every day more urgent. Two plans have, at different times, been drawn out and submitted to the Emperor, either of which the state of the public finances prevented hitherto being put into execution. Now, however, delay becomes danger, and the required works are about shortly to be set on foot.

It is rumoured that there exists a set of memoirs, written and arranged in due form by the Princess Lieven; but better-informed chroniclers generally deny that such is the case, and affirm that the Princess only left notes, correspondence, and other documents suitable to form materials for a memoir, and that these, with the rest of her papers, were by her confided to M. Guizot, to be disposed of according to his discretion; that among them are a vast number of letters from Prince Metternich, the Duke of Wellington, Canning, and, in fact, most of the remarkable personages, including a number of the crowned heads, of the day; and that many of these papers are of so delicate and important a nature that the publication of them—at all events during the existence of the present generation—is impossible. It is even whispered that the Russian Embassy has interfered in the matter, and is endeavouring to obtain from M. Guizot the cession of a certain portion of the documents in question.

The speech of M. Guizot, at the Institute, met with the highest success as was anticipated; that of M. Biot was well received by those who heard it, which was not a very large proportion of the audience. A number of the chief members of the Institute, including MM. Thiers, Berryer, Montalembert, de Broglie, Duchâtel, &c., were present on the occasion.

There have been many assertions and contradictions relative to the fact of the Comte de Chambord having desired his adherents to refrain from voting in the approaching elections. The truth seems to be that the reality of the reports hung on a word; that the Count de Chambord has not desired his followers to adopt such a line of conduct, but has expressed his wish on the subject, and declared that he considered it the only one they could properly adhere to.

The controversies, religious and otherwise, respecting the assassin Verger, have risen to such a height that it is said the Government has interfered to put a stop to their publication. However this may be, it is certain they have suddenly fallen into silence within a few days. Crowds daily proceed to the Ecole de Médecine, to see the model of the criminal's head; and a few days since an encumberment took place in the Rue de l'Ecole de Médecine, before the stall of a marchand de plâtres moulés, to look at a cast which it was reported was that of the murderer. It has been forbidden by the superior authorities to execute any casts of the head for sale.

The nomination of the new Archbishop has been a severe blow to the Ultramontane party, which in all points loses ground in France. The Univers has lowered its tone in an extraordinary degree; and after for years leading the van in all polemics—attacking, abusing, decrying its opponents with a ferocity and virulence unequalled—it humbly withdraws from all discussion, and, after deprecating in meek regretful terms the bitter tone of controversy adopted by the religious press (!!!), declares that nothing shall induce it to enter in future into any such disputes! and this after the vehement attack made on the party of the Univers by M. de Montalembert in his article on the new edition of the "Mémoires de St. Simon."

Last week took place a magnificent ball at the Hôtel de Ville, at which figured the Persian Ambassador and the principal officers of his suite.

The Revue de Paris, in the persons of MM. Laurent Pichat editor, Pillet printer, and Flaubert author, has been acquitted in a trial brought against it for the publication of a work by the last-named defendant, declared to be an offence against religion and morals, entitled "Mdme. Bovary," the grounds of the accusation not being found by the Tribunal sufficient to support the charge.

The enormous reductions made on the total of the Budget allow of a small number of augmentations on certain points. Among the privileged bodies is that of the Legion of Honour, to whose resources will be added a sum of four millions of francs.

It appears that we are to be blessed with a spring and early summer such as have not been seen for a long time. A certain Abbé, whose name we cannot confide to our readers for the excellent reason that he is unknown to ourselves, has for a series of years applied himself with such success and attention to meteorological observations, that his predictions prove, so we are assured, almost unfailing. Well, the Abbé in question declares that, from March till July, we are to have an almost uninterrupted series of fine weather—warm, genial, and in all respects seasonable and favourable to agriculture. On the other hand, a German astronomer, said to be of high reputation and great erudition, assures us that the march of a comet now approaching the earth will compass its entire destruction; and he even fixes the day—the 16th June—for the said catastrophe to arrive.

It appears that Eugène Sue, in his retreat at Annecy, in Savoy, has become the object of the peculiar animosity of the clergy of the place, whether on account of his general principles, or from any more definite and recent cause, does not appear. However this may be, we are assured that the peasants who have been in the habit of supplying his wants and working for him are now interdicted by their spiritual adviser from so doing, and that some of those who have rendered him the most ordinary services have been refused absolution in consequence.

The dance which alone finds favour in the sight of the beau monde this season has been borrowed from the choregraphic répertoire of our barbarous island: this is the Lanciers, our old Lancers, quadrille, somewhat decked up and revivified, and two or three new steps and figures thrown in, but, notwithstanding these alterations, in the main the same as the dance that was quitting the dancing-school about the time we were entering it. This is a feather in the cap of us poor insulars, who hitherto have been supposed to have no indigenous Terpsichorean exercise but "le jigue."

At last the "Question d'Argent" of A. Dumas, fils, has made its appearance, and been crowned with success. It is a most clever piece, full of wit, sparkle, and observation; but the characters excite neither interest nor sympathy; many of them are very indifferently sustained; and, instead of any of the passion and dramatic interest the subject admitted of, the thing is cold, hard, business-like, and full of the details of the every-day life of speculators and worshippers of the golden calf in general. Many of the materials for the piece were furnished by a certain spiritual physician, as well versed in finance as in medicine.

THE WAR WITH PERSIA.

It was confidently affirmed in the early part of the week that the Persian difficulty was all but settled. The interviews of Ferouk Khan with Lord Cowley and resulted in a satisfactory basis of arrangement Persia was to evacuate Herat, and England to restore Bushire, on the condition that we should be allowed an establishment on the Isle of Karrak, and the right of way through Fars, Kerman, and other provinces, for the purposes of the Euphrates Railway. The report has not been confirmed, however, although the prevailing impression is that the war will not last.

The Press d'Orient of the 2nd inst. gives the following as items from its latest letters from Teheran, down to the 1st January:—"The most important point is the despatch of an Ambassador to the Shah of Persia from the Khan of Khiva. The intelligence of the fall of Herat had excited a great sensation among the Turcoman population to the south-east of the Caspian Sea. The Khan of Khiva, whose territories border on Khorassan, and who had been guilty of some acts of hostility against Persia, hastened to send an Embassy to Nasser-ed-din Shah. He charged his own brother with this mission, in conjunction with the brother of the chiefs of the demons, a powerful nomad tribe. Accounts had been received at Teheran of the arrival of these chiefs at Astrabad. In order to secure a good reception for his Embassy, the Khan of Khiva had sent back into Persia 10,000 Turcoman families of Khorassan, and 1000 Persian families who had been reduced to slavery. The Kokhans, a Turcoman tribe established on the Oxus, had also re-entered Khorassan, where a district near Kariesla had been assigned them. In consequence of a quarrel, however, between these Kokhans and other Turcomans, the Governor-General of Astrabad had dispatched a force, and removed the tribe near to Kalpanch. Among the Candahar chiefs who have made their submission to the Sultan is (says the Teheran Gazette) one of the most important men in the country, Ahmed Khan, son of the Sirdar Mehemed-Azam Khan."

The Teheran Gazette of the 24th of December contains a kind of "exposé des motifs" in answer to the declaration of war received from Calcutta. This document throws all the blame of the Herat affair on the people of that city, and on Dost Mohammed whom, however, it accuses England of exciting and sustaining.

The Governor of Tabriz had called for the garrison from Maraga to put down an insurrectionary movement of the population; and, as soon as the troops had quitted Maraga, that place was attacked by the tribes of Bakarlou and Moukadoum, and the mosques sacked. The town of Maragu is in the extreme north-west corner of Persia, and is situated on the Saffie, not far from the spot where that stream falls into Lake Urmia. It is about fifty miles south-west of Tabriz. It was formerly a place of some importance, but of late years has greatly declined.

The statement made by the Russian Embassy at Berlin, that the Persian Court, on learning the fall of Herat, had manifested an intention to push hostilities to their utmost verge, and had declared a holy war, is contradicted by the Pays, which says, the only step taken by the Court of Teheran, on hearing of the occupation of the Persian Gulf, was to order its army of the south to put itself in motion so as to cover Ispahan. That order was immediately carried out. The vanguard of the first division, commanded by Yezdan Khan, already occupies the defiles, and in the first week of February Meerza Mohammed Khan will occupy Shiraz, the chief town of Farsistan, where he will establish his head quarters. Notwithstanding these orders the Persian Government has not ceased to evince a disposition to treat for peace, but in taking these defensive positions it clearly intends to provide for its own interests while negotiating for a restoration of peace.

The news from Constantinople states that the latest intelligence received in that city from Asia announced that the Russians "appeared to be about to march into Persia."

Fifteen English vessels were at anchor off Bender-Abbas, and received supplies from Bagdad.

By letters from St. Petersburg, dated Feb. 11, we have the following items of news from Teheran to the 3rd of January:—

Since the taking of Bushire the English have attempted nothing. A squadron had appeared off Port Muhammerah, at the mouth of the Shat-el-Arab. Its operations were only for the present. The Persians are sending cannon to its neighbourhood. Feridh Khan the Governor of Herat, after having defended that city meritoriously against the Persians, has been assassinated by the Afghans.

THE UNION OF THE PRINCIPALITIES.

It was reported at Constantinople on the 29th that the Moldo-Wallachian Divans would propose the union of the two Principalities into one, by a considerable majority. It was also said that the Porte would altogether relinquish its resistance to the scheme, and content itself with stipulating that no foreign Prince should become the Sovereign of the new State.

The article in the Moniteur of the 4th, relative to the future organisation of the Danubian Principalities, has produced a very unpleasant impression at Vienna. The Vienna Presse observes, that the recent policy of France in the Eastern question cannot excite astonishment, if it is considered that Count Morny is to pass the winter at St. Petersburg, and the Grand Duke Constantine to visit the Emperor Napoleon in the spring. The most remarkable passage in the article in question is the following:—

The mask has now been laid aside, and the question of the Principalities is to be made an affair of the highest importance. The declaration of the Moniteur will give fresh vigour and courage to Russia, for the union of the Danubian Principalities will be the first great step towards the breaking up of Turkey—it will be a positive encroachment on the sovereign rights of the Sultan, and an act of hostility towards the Powers which closed up the land and sea route from Russia to Constantinople.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says:—

There was a rumour at one time that a certain high functionary, who, no doubt, thinks he is the best judge of his own deserts, had cast his eye on the Moldo-Wallachian crown, even if the crown were some degrees below a Royal one. The rumour was, no doubt, an absurd one, and it may therefore be dismissed. There is, however, now in Paris one of those petty Princes who roam about, like wandering stars, in the political horizon. The Duke of Nassau has, it seems, come highly recommended by the Queen of Holland to some members of the Imperial family, as well as to the Emperor himself. Her Dutch Majesty is reported to have said, or written, in a charming off-hand sort of way, adverting to the Principalities:—"Voyons, est-ce qu'on ne peut pas faire quelque chose pour ce pauvre petit Nassau." The Duke would probably make as good a Prince of Moldo-Wallachia as any one else; and if it be true that he is betrothed to a daughter of the Duke of Leuchtenberg, the niece of the Emperor of Russia, and cousin of the Emperor of the French, Russia would not any more than France pronounce him ineligible, in the event of the Principalities being united and a foreign Prince placed over them.

The Vienna journals express themselves strongly against the note in the Moniteur relative to the Principalities. The Ost. Deutsche Post is particularly remarkable for its violence. As to the Augsburg Gazette, its language, as becomes an official organ, is less violent.

Accounts from Bucharest of the 5th and state that the Austrian troops in the neighbourhood were making preparations to depart, but that for the moment no idea of moving could be entertained, as the cold was intense, whilst the high grounds were too deeply covered with snow to permit the transport without a heavy loss of artillery and baggage.

AMERICA.

The Cunard Royal Mail steam-ship America, which left Boston on the 29th ult., arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday. Owing to the severity of the weather when she sailed from Boston, the harbour was covered with ice, and a passage had to be cut through it for a distance of several miles, before the America could proceed to sea. The ice was two feet thick. The merchants of Boston were at the expense of the operation. The America appears to have suffered considerable damage, having a large quantity of copper torn from her hull, and many of her paddle-floats broken or carried away. It was just thirteen years before when a passage of two miles had to be made for the Britannia steam-ship, of the same line, to enable her to proceed to sea from Boston harbour.

In the House of Representatives, on the 27th ult., Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a modified Tariff Bill. It embraced the following features:—Schedules 5, 10, and 15 per cent of the Act of 1846, with few exceptions, are observed by the free list; the 40 per cent schedule, principally silks, is also, with the exception of a few items, carried to the free list, which reduces the revenue about 6,000,000 dols.; the 100 per cent schedule, spirits, is brought down one-half. Sugar, molasses, lead, salt, wool, and hemp are put at 10 per cent, reducing the revenue about 7,000,000 dollars. Iron, cotton, woollen, and silk manufactures are retained as now. The old 20, 25, and 30 per cent schedules are not materially changed, but some items in them are carried to the free list. The direct reduction of the revenue annually will be about 13,000,000 dollars, which, it is supposed, will be increased some millions by the effects of the measure in substituting home manufactures for those imported.

The President elect, Mr. James Buchanan, arrived at Washington on the 27th ult. There was a number of his friends awaiting his arrival, but no public reception took place.

The Hon. Preston R. Brooks, well known as the "caner" of Mr. Sumner, in the House of Representatives, died at Washington on the 27th ult., at Brown's Hotel. He had been in bed a day or two, suffering from the effects of a severe cold. His was telling his friends he had passed the crisis of his illness, and felt considerably improved in health, when he was seized with violent croup, and died in about ten minutes afterwards. He expired in intense pain. Perhaps an American journalist's record of the event may fittingly be substituted for a foreigner's obituary. The Atlas, of Boston, observes:—"The sudden death of Preston S. Brooks, by one of the most virulent and painful diseases that afflict humanity, can scarcely fail to impress the public as a signal instance of Divine retribution for atrocious and penal crimes. A bold and arrogant man, while yet boasting of his dastardly outrage—while yet swaggering with the baronite honours showered upon him by a brutalised constituency his lips still quivering with threats against the friends and associates of his victim—is seized by the throat by an invisible and irresistible grasp, and strangled to death. He died, says a despatch from Washington, a horrid death, suffering intensely, and endeavouring to tear his own throat open to get breath."

In the House of Representatives, the Submarine (European and American) Telegraph Bill had been referred to a Committee of Ways and Means.

New Orleans advices state that the recent snowstorm did not prevail with any violence further south than Columbia. The cold and been intense, and the railroads were stopped, owing to the impossibility of getting water.

The British steamer Thames arrived at Aspinwall Jan. 19, from Greytown, bringing thirty-five of Walker's men, who were transferred to the steamer Grenada, which immediately left for Greytown to receive the Filibusters brought out by the Texas and James Adger, and convey them to New Orleans. Walker had evacuated Rivas, and was at St. George's, surrounded by the allies, who had offered him terms of surrender; and, as he was cut off from his supplies, it was hourly expected he would surrender. It was reported that the steamer Sierra Nevada had been captured by the Costa Ricans.

COLONIAL APPOINTMENTS.—The following appointments have been made at the Colonial Office:—Hayes Lee, to be a member of the Executive Council of the Falkland Islands; and A. H. Rainbow, Bart., to be President of the Council of Nevis. A. Price, Esq., to be President of the Council, in the room of Captain Pemberton, Esq., to be a member of the Council of Nevis; J. Judons and W. Forgan, Esq., to be members of the Legislative Council of Prince Edward Island; John J. Robinson, Esq., to be a member of the Legislative Council of New Brunswick; and E. W. Alexander, Esq., to be colonial surgeon at St. Helena.

SIR JAMSETJEE JEEJEBHOY.—A deputation—consisting of Colonel Sykes (Chairman of the Court of Directors of the East India Company), Sir George Anderson, Mr. John Abel Smith, M.P., Mr. G. Moffatt, M.P., and Sir H. B. E. Frere, Chief Commissioner of Scinde—had an interview with Lord Palmerston on the 29th ult.; the object being to represent to the Premier the distinguished merit of Sir Jamsetjee Jeejebhoy, of Bombay, and to request that his Lordship would submit for Her Majesty the additional honour of a Baronetcy for that [illegible] A Life and Memoir of Sir Jamsetjee appeared in [illegible] 8 for December 6, 18[illegible].

WE regret to learn (says the Brechin Advertiser) that Mr W. F. Baxter, M.P., has been confined to bed by a severe attack of illness, and is therefore unable to resume his Parliamentary duties.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THE House of Commons is prone to finishing the week with a hard night's work. The sittings on Fridays are generally the most prolonged, and often the most important, of the week; and the vitality of members is always so apparent on that night that it leads to a notion that they wish to show that they have earned their holiday on Saturday. It could only have been the influence of this feeling which led to the attenuation of the debate on the Bank Charter Act on Friday last. The character of the discussion may be sufficiently indicated by the fact that Lord Overstone (who, when he forsook the name of Jones Loyd, was supposed to have also forsaken everything but the theory of banking, which he has recently been illustrating in the well-known letters to the Times signed "Mercator") was in the gallery, and was fast asleep for the greater portion of the evening. The subject was money, and the theories which were occasionally broached were sufficiently startling; but, nevertheless, the number of somnolent members bore a very remarkable proportion to the small number that wakefully sat out the debate. Certainly, its inception by the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was calculated to act like "drowsy syrups" on his hearers; and there was nothing afterwards to rouse them except, perhaps, the sharp intelligence of Mr. Glyn's ejaculation seemed to be elicited from the proceedings, that, if the Bank of England succeeds in getting one more renewal of its charter in its present form, that must be the last.

Soon after his accession to the Premiership it became the fashion to liken the position of Lord Palmerston to that of Lord Chatham; and the phrase of the "modern Chatham" is a favouritesirony of Mr. Disraeli, when he is in wordy combat with the Premier. It would seem as if the Prime Minister was destined to carry out the parallel with even physical exactitude, for his fits of the gout are becoming more frequent; and he evinces quite as great an aptitude for governing the country from his couch, with his "flannels gracefully arranged," as did his great prototype. Although absent from the House from the second day of the Session until Tuesday last, his spirit has, nevertheless, animated the conduct of the Government business; and it has been observed that temporary responsibility has actually roused Sir Cornewall Lewis out of his usual apathetic manner. It could hardly have been anticipated that the Government had such a bold measure in contemplation for taking the wind out of the sails of their opponents as the bringing on of the Budget on the thirteenth day of the Session. There was a lurking mischief in the usually downcast and inexpressive eyes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and almost a chuckle in the tone of his voice, when he announced that fact to the gentlemen who, a few hours before, had so haughtily refused to bate an hour of the time they had fixed for bringing on their motions on the subject of the Income-tax. Mr. Disraeli was anticipated by a fortnight; and Major Reed felt his political capital for the Session collapse in his grasp. Even Mr. Gladstone looked discomfited; and a sort of restlessness with which he seems to have become troubled, and which appears as if it were neuralgic, was visibly increased. In short, as Christopher North said of Wellington and the French at Waterloo, if the Opposition intended to surprise the Government, the Government contrived to astonish them.

The earnestness with which Mr. Disraeli had inquired when he should have the pleasure of meeting Lord Palmerston face to face on the subject of the "Secret Treaty" very naturally caused a large gathering of members on Tuesday to witness a favourite diversion of our legislators—a personal encounter between two of its celebrities. The outward world, too, mustered thickly in the Strangers' Gallery; the seats appropriated to Peers were thronged, among the most notable members of the Upper House being Lord Derby, Lord Malmesbury, Lord Eglinton, Lord Stanhope, Lord Wensleydale, &c., &c.; while in the Ambassadors' Gallery the diplomatic corps was fully represented Conspicuous among them sat the sable Plenipotentiary of the Emperor of Hayti, in curious juxtaposition to Mr. Dallas, the American Minister—a sufficiently suggestive spectacle. Mr. Disraeli was evidently impatient, for he came into the House a minute or two before four o'clock, and he wore an air of calm triumph that was but little prophetic of the result of the occasion. At this time it was whispered about the House that Lord Palmerston was still unable to attend; but the rumour was practically contradicted by the large attendance of those who were sure to know whether the expected feat of intellectual gladiatorship was really to come off. Accordingly, at twenty minutes to five the First Minister appeared, looking pale, his pallor set off by a suit of deep black. He was still slightly lame, and leaned heavily while he was speaking on a fine specimen of stalwart Irish blackthorn. The usual preliminary questions and answers were listened to with visible impatience; and at length, amidst the profoundest silence, Mr. Disraeli rose, and commenced, in low, measured, and even tremulous tones, the first sentence of his address. But he was doomed to the greatest misfortune that can happen to an orator in a set speech—an early interruption. Whether Mr. Thomas Duncombe's interposition was spontaneous, or whether it was part of a plan, the effect was the same. Although no longer the "Tom of Ten Thousand"—although his manly beauty has, alas! been somewhat changed by time and sickness Mr. Duncombe still has the power of making the House listen, and, if the object was to disconcert Mr. Disraeli, to a certain extent it was successful. It seemed as if the heaviness—not to say ponderosity—of the greater part of his observations was caused by this interruption of his ideas in their first flow; and, what was worse, in a few moments he must have perceived that the House was not with him. He got angry, for he got paler and paler—he never reddens with rage, because his rage is always suppressed and inward—but more, he got irritated, because he saw that Lord Palmerston was listening to the whispers of the Attorney-General instead of to him; and he uttered a parenthetic rudeness on that point, which was not lost on the House; and, when Lord Palmerston (probably with a sinister view, like that which instigated the contemptuous throwing away of his notes of Erskine's first speech by Pitt) actually left the House for a short time at the most critical conjecture of his speech, Mr. Disraeli's mortification must have been complete. The manner in which he endeavoured to prove his reiterated charge was so vague and unsatisfactory that the House after a while ceased to preserve entire silence; while Lord Derby, watching with intense vigilance the proceedings, was observed to look grave, then to grow fidgetty, and then to whisper ominously to Lord Malmesbury. The cheers from the Opposition benches which greeted what were intended to be the striking points of the speech were neither frequent nor hearty; while the attempt at pathos at the conclusion was without doubt a failure.

With every advantage, then, Lord Palmerston rose to reply, and certainly his address smacked neither of gout nor water-gruel. The matter of it may have been to a certain degree open to the objection, that it was rather a specimen of his skill in getting out of difficulties; but, as a mere reply to that of his opponent, it was triumphant, and that because he succeeded in doing that in which Mr. Disraeli failed and which is everything in a House of Commons' discussion—he carried the House with him. If there be anything in the opinion of the generality of those who witnessed this "keen encounter of wits," it is not at all probable that there will be a third performance of the drama of the "Secret Treaty"

The vacant seats in the Commons are fast filling by the termination of most of the new elections; and in connection with that subject it may be mentioned that the loss which the conductors of the private business of the House sustained by the death of Mr. Brotherton has been supplied by Mr. Duncan, the member for Dundee, who has undertaken the arduous duty of introducing and carrying through their first stages most of the private bills (more numerous by three by than they have been for the last three years) of the Session. It is understood that Mr. Olrein Labouchere is to succeed himself for this part; but he has appar ntly yielded to the claims of the most assiduous and regular attendant in the House, Mr. Duncan.

The House of Lords has been distinguished principally by the fact of the reappearance, in vigour as unimpaired as it was last year of Lord Lyndhurst, who still takes a part in its discussions, which, under all the circumstances, must be called active. It is not improbable that his Lordship will again deliver one or two of those orations which have made him the most famous octogenarian of this or indeed of most times. It may, perhaps, be thought to be starting an unkind heresy if it were to be hinted that the most ardent well-wishers of the noble and learned Lord must be desirous that he should abstain at least from that species of Parliamentary duty. It cannot be disguised that last year, wonderful as they were, all things considered, yet if his set speeches had been delivered by any one but Lord Lyndhurst they would not have attracted any marked attention. With the observation that the Lord Chancellor seems to have stumbled almost on the very threshold of his law reforms, the Upper House may be left to the comparative repose which it is accustomed to enjoy at this period of the year.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

MR. FITZHERBERT.

THOMAS FITZHERBERT, Esq., of Norbury, in the county of Derby, and of Swinnerton, in the county of Stafford the head and representative of one of the oldest and most important untitled families in the empire, was the eldest son of Basil Fitzherbert, Esq., of Norbury and Swinnerton, and the nephew of that Mr. Fitzherbert whose name was the celebrated and universally respected Mrs Fitzherbert of the time of George IV. Thomas Fitzherbert, the subject of this notice, was born the 21st Jan., 1789, and succeeded his father the 23rd Nov., 1796. He married the 15th July, 1809, Mary Anne Sophia, daughter of John Palmer Chichester, Esq., of Arlington, Devonshire, by whom he leaves one only son, Charles, his successor. Mr Fitzherbert died on the 4th inst., at his residence, 15, Clarges-street, Piccadilly. He was the twenty-ninth lord of the manor of Norbury and the tenth lord of that of Swinnerton. His family name appears on the roll of Battle Abbey, and his race has flourished in England ever since the Conquest We find among these Fitzherberts many a renowned knight, cavalier, soldier, and civilian. The most distinguished of the house was the great lawyer, Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, whose learned work, "De Natura Brevium," is a famous and favourite tome with jurists.

GENERAL WALKER.

GENERAL FREDERICK WALKER, of the Manor House, Bushey, Herts, K.C.H., Colonel of the 7th Battalion of the Royal Artillery, whose death occurred on the 3rd inst., entered the Royal Artillery in 1794. In 1794 he joined the army under the Duke of York in Holland, where he won renown on several occasions, especially (when engaged with Count Hammerstein's Hanoverian troops, under the command of Count Walmoden) at the passage of the Rhine near Arnheim. Walker there covered the retreat of the army with the artillery under his command. In doing so he received three wounds, one of them very severe. A complimentary allusion to his conduct appeared in the despatches of the time. The late King of Hanover conferred on Walker the Guelphic Order in 1837. General Walker served in various parts of the British dominions, and was actively employed during the Rebellion of 1798 in Ireland. The brave veteran was the second son of Major Nathaniel Walker, and the brother of the late distinguished General Sir George Walker, G.C.B., who filled many high military stations, and was created a Baronet in 1838. General Frederick Walker married Henrietta, only daughter and heiress of Captain Bagster, R.N.; and by her (who is deceased) he leaves issue one son, Lieut.-Colonel R. W. F. Walker, of the Scots Fusilier Guards, who is married to Jane, only daughter of the late Earl of Seafield; and four daughters, the youngest of whom is the wife of the Rev. Percy Monro General Frederick Walker's nephew is the present Sir George Ferdinand Radzevill Walker, Bart., of the Coldstream Guards. In fact, for now more than a century nearly every man of this gallant family has been in the British or East India Company's army

WILLS.—The will and two codicils of Lieutenant-General the Right Hon. Sir Henry Pottinger, Bart., G.C.B., one of her Majesty's Most Hon. Privy Councillors, has just been proved in London, the personalty within the province of Canterbury being sworn under £70,000. The will was executed in London, dated 17th July, 1855; the codicils at Malta, 21st Dec., 1855, and 26th Jan., 1856: the executor for India being Sylvester Douglas Birke, Esq., of the Madras Civil Service; the acting executor for England being Sir Frederick W. Pottinger, Bart., the son, the other executors having renounced. The service of plate presented to him by the merchants of Malta, the silver salver by the inhabitants of London, Manchester, and Liverpool, the gold armlet by his Excellency Keyling, on his negotiating the Treaty of Nankin, and the clock and two vases by the Indies of Madras, are to be held as heirlooms with the baronetcy, and the possession of the plate-chest in Eaton-place. Sir Frederick is appointed residuary legatee of both real and personal estate —The will of the late Richard Lee, Esq., of Weymouth-street has been proved in Doctors'-commons as under £200,000. The bulk of this large property is settled by the testator upon the family of the late David Bevan, Esq. (who married a sister of testator), and their children after them

CRUELTIES ON BOARD AMERICAN SHIPS.—A special report from the managing committee to the members of the Liverpool Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress calls attention to the sufferings inflicted upon foreigners by the system in force at some of the ports of the United States for supplying the American mercantile marine with sailors. All sorts of confrivances, it appears, are resorted to at New York to obtain crews for the American packet-ships. For instance, the New York shipping agents advertise, in English and in German, for "young men, who need not have been at sea before, to work as deck labourers at fair wages." Under this pretext they are decoyed on board, and when once there they are retained by force. Others engage of their own accord as ordinary seamen, cooks, carpenters, &c., but are also deceived; others again are enticed into public-houses, made drunk, and thus betrayed on board It is on record that many have been offered work on board a steamer in the river, or to unload ships, and are thus prevailed upon to step into a small boat to be carried on board, which leaves them as soon as they are put on the deck of the ship, where they are retained forcibly. Among the applicants for relief there had been coopers, carpenters, cooks, waiters, clerks, and surgeons, who have been carried off in the nefarious way. Very soon after they are on board they are robbed of most of their effects, and there is no redress to be obtained, their remonstrances are laughed at or answered by ill-treatment, and the same means are employed to force them to go aloft and to do all that able seamen are expected to do.

It is stated that, out of 110 articled clerks who attended for examination as attorneys, as many as 30 were sent back.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

REDUCTIONS on an extensive scale are ordered to be put into execution in the Government Departments at Woolwich at the end of the present financial year. In addition to the dismissal of the various clerks classed as extras during the late stress of work, the services of the whole of the temporary clerks, a number of whom have been always attached to the establishment, are ordered to be dispensed with. With a demand for the reduction of the Income-tax, and with a strong desire of corresponding with the rigid instructions of economy which have been issued, about 2000 artificers and labourers are likewise to be discharged at the end of March -namely, 1000 from the Royal Laboratory, 500 from the Carriage Department, and about 500 from the Storekeeper's and the Gun Factory Departments. Reports are current to the effect that the majority of the Artillery officers employed in superintending the departments of Woolwich Arsenal are to be superseded by civilians experienced in the duties of the departments; the services of the military officers having been demanded by the Commander-in-Chief. Other important changes are likewise to be made in the Store branch of the War Department, which will add greatly to the efficiency of the establishment. Many of those who are advanced in life are to be allowed to retire on the superannuation list.

THE Northfleet freight-ship, of 1200 tons burden, arrived at Woolwich on Saturday last, and commenced shipping a heavy cargo of 18-inch mortars, battering guns, shot, shell, ammunition, artillery waggons, and other war stores for China. The freight-ships Hyperion and Shannon, in the London Docks, are likewise chartered for the same purpose.

RECRUITING for the several infantry regiments having on the present suspended, it has been determined that the Indian establishments in want of men to complete their strength augmented from regiments which are above their proper establishment. A number of men belonging to various inf try regiments at Aldershot have volunteered for the 38th, 70th, and 94th Regiments, and will proceed to Chatham to join the depôts of those corps at that garrison.

IT is reported that the Nimrod, 6, is to be commissioned and proceed to China, to relieve the Barracouta, 6.

THE Renown, 91, screw-steamer, having been completed at Chatham Dockyard, preparations are being made for launching her, which event is expected to take place during the ensuing month.

A LIFE-BOAT intended for presentation by Government to the Government of Chili, in consideration of succour rendered by the Chilians to British mariners in distress, is lying on the boathouse wharf at Woolwich, awaiting an opportunity for conveyance to her destination.

A GREAT deal of activity prevails among the troops at Chatham garrison, where there are at present about 500 men, belonging to the various branches of the service, daily undergoing a course of rifle instruction. As the season is approaching when nearly 2000 young soldiers will leave Chatham to join the head-quarters of their respective regiments in India, great pains are being taken to have each man instructed in the use of the Enfield rifle previously to his landing in that country.

THE Admiralty yacht Vivid has been placed gratuitously by Government at the disposal of the Royal Mail Packet Company for three months, to run between Dover and the Continental ports.

A little drizzling rain fell on the night of the 5th and on the afternoon of the 8th, and it was showery on the morning of the 9th and afternoon of the 10th. The thaw was proceeding rapidly during the day and night of the 8th, and the snow had altogether disappeared by the following day.

A fine halo was visible round the moon at 8h. 30m. p.m. of February 4; the stars Aldebaran and Capella were just situated within its interior border. A faint halo was likewise perceptible at 8 p.m. of the 10th

The sky remains considerably overcast, but was partly clear on the days of the 9th, 10th, and 11th, and on the nights of the 6th and 10th. The wind has been blowing freshly since Feb. 7.

The daily means are obtained from observations made at 6h. and 10h. a.m. and 2h., 6h., and 10h. p.m. on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the Tables of Mr Glaisher. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The movement of the wind is given by a self-registering Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

THE SNOWSTORM IN THE UNITED STATES.—The weather continues excessively cold, and everything is resuming the intensely Polar condition from which we thought we had escaped. With the thaw of the second week the buildings, at least in the city, is not a pleasure, and for the last two days the brilliancy of the first dash into it has been departing. It has taken the business-like appearance of a necessity. The severe cold has preserved the snow, but following, as it did, a partial thaw on the 22nd, it has coated everything with ice, and walking is attended with peril to the limbs, or requires as much caution that it is impossible to move rapidly enough to keep the blood from congelation. The railways have begun to run again, though very irregularly. The first train from Washington since the 30th came in last night, having been four days and nights achieving 240 miles. Travellers who left any city on a distant journey on the evening of the severe Sunday (the 18th) were not expected to arrive any now till at intervals at the points of arrival, publish dismal accounts of their sufferings in drifts and cuttings, in which they were snowed up for twenty four hours at a time, depending on forays in the vicinity for food and on the scattered trees for fire. The storm threw all the mercantile machinery of the city out of gear; none of the distant mails for the steamer to Europe of the 21st came in; draughts, bills, and advices were missing; and the telegraphs were hard at work, doing their confusion right as well as it could be done.—Letter from New York, Jan. 24.

AN ARCHBISHOP IN A FIX.—A funny story has found its way to Paris of the way in which even Archbishops may be embarrassed by the multitude of the female fashions of the day. A letter from Milan says that the Archbishop of Milan, meeting the Empress of Austria on the staircase of the Duomo, by some unlucky accident became so entangled in the Empress's drapery as to be extricated only by carrying away some ells of the redundant folds, to the immense diversion of the young and august victim, whose smiles, at last lapsing into downright laughter, increased the embarrassment of the venerable prelate.

POISONING BY MISTAKE.—A case of poisoning by mistake in preparing a prescription has occurred at Baltimore, but with an additional and very singular tragical result. The prescription was for a child, which it killed instantly. The physician took the remainder of the medicine to the druggist, and told him he had made a dreadful error. The druggist perceived he had not, and was so confident in his accuracy that he swallowed a portion of the mixture himself. It was a fatal confidence; his drugs were quick; in five minutes he was a dead apothecary. On analysis it appeared he had mixed a preparation of prussic acid strong enough to kill fifty men.—Letter from New York.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH OF ST. THOMAS OF CANTERBURY, FULHAM.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH OF ST. THOMAS OF CANTERBURY, AT FULHAM.

This handsome edifice was erected in 1848, from the designs of the late A. W. Pugin; and the steeple (of comparatively recent erection) may be considered one of the best works of that lamented architect. The edifice, of Kentish rag and Bath stone, was built at the sole expense of Mrs. Elizabeth Bowden, mainly with the object of providing a fitting place of worship for the poor Roman Catholics labouring in the large market-gardens of the district, numbering nearly 2000 souls. There is no endowment, but the seats of this church are entirely free, and the attendance is very numerous.

The high altar is richly carved with an enthroned figure of the patron Saint, attended by angels; and the altars and reredos of the Lady Chapel and the Chapel of St. John the Evangelist, together with the font, the sumbries, and the pulpit (of strikingly unique design), are all exquisitely carved in Caen stone from Mr. Pugin's designs. The chancel is divided from the aisles by a traceried parvise, or side-screen, of oak, and from the nave by a low communion-rail, to be surmounted by a rood. The tower is 142 feet high to the top of the cross, and is intended to contain a good peal of bells, two of which (a fine tenor of 20 cwt. and a treble of 5 cwt.) are already hung.

Contiguous to the church, and surrounded by a large playground, are the schools, capable of holding 300 children; and a late report of her Majesty's Inspector of Schools speaks favourably of their organisation.

The church, with its spacious cemetery, schools, and rectory, seen amidst the semi-rustic labourers' cottages of Fulham fields, form a highly-picturesque group of buildings, creditable to the munificence of the foundress.

Here has been established a sick and burial guild, and a very efficient choir of poor boys educated on the spot; and here, during the late winter seasons, regular lectures on astronomy and sacred history, illustrated by dissolving diagrams and views, have been delivered gratuitously by the resident priest, and have been attended by crowds of the poor; so that (apart from doctrinal considerations) much practical good has been effected since the opening of the church and schools.

ALTAR-TOMB IN LEDBURY CHURCH.

This altar-tomb and group of sculpture have been executed by Mr. Thornycroft, and erected in the chancel of Ledbury Church, to the infant son of Mr. John Martin, M.P., of the Upper Hall, Ledbury.

The child reposes in the placid sleep of infancy, its little hands trustfully crossed on its breast. Angels grouped at the head guard sleeper—one bearing the crown of immortality, waiting the approved the architectural arrangement of the Middle Ages, combined with sculpture of a higher order. It bears the following inscription:—

John Hamilton, the beloved infant son of John Martin and Maria Henretta, his wife, born April 23rd, 1850, died March 18th, 1851.

"Them which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

LANCASHIRE MILITIA DEPOT.

This building presents a favourable specimen of the superior accommodation provided of late for our militia force. It has been built as the dépôt for the 3rd Regiment of the Royal Lancashire Militia, at Preston, under the superintendence of Messrs. Cawley and Radford, of Manchester. The plan contains an armoury, store-room, room for clothing and accoutrements; orderly-room and office; guard-room and five prison cells; and dwelling for thirteen sergeants, to each of whom is allotted forty-two square yards of floor. The bastions flank the several sides of the building, which can thus be easily defended by a few inmates. A spacious yard surrounds the edifice, and sheds are provided under which, in bad weather, the men are drilled.

ANCIENT ARCH IN ST. BENEDICT'S CHURCH, CAMBRIDGE.

The chief point of interest about this venerable and time-worn church is the tower, of which the whole is Saxon, although a modern door, and, indeed, window over it, have been inserted. This tower, however interesting to those having sufficient architectural knowledge to appreciate its peculiarities, was to the majority, until very lately, an old and rather ugly structure attached to a nave and chancel, in that unsightly style which Cole, the antiquary, designated as "beautified in the true meaning of the term." Recently a handsome north aisle has been erected, which is appropriate and in good taste, and this addition has led to the removal of many of the hideous "beautified" windows. The corners of this tower—which consists of three stories, each story being smaller than the one beneath it—exhibit fine specimens of the "long and short work" so characteristic of these ancient edifices—a succession of long and short stones alternating. The original windows still remain in the upper story of the tower, and, from their singularity, are often pointed out to strangers. On each side, in the middle of the wall, and resting on the square-edged string-course which divides the story from the larger story below it, is a double window, with semicircular arched heads, and divided by a ballustar shaft; this shaft is encircled about the middle of its height by annulated mouldings, which serve to divide it into two parts, each of which exhibits the entasis, or swelling, found in other window shafts of coeval date, and forming one of the peculiar features of the style. The shaft thus described sustains a plain projecting square-edged impost, or abacus, of an oblong form, which appears to extend through the whole thickness of the wall. The double window arches are hewn out of a single block, and rest on the impost or abacus of the ballustar shaft and the projecting abace of the window jambs, which latter are of ashlar. On each side of these double windows, but higher up, is a plain semicircular-headed window, with straight-sided jambs; and in the wall above each of these, but not disposed quite regularly, is a circular orifice or aperture formed in a square block of stone, the use or meaning of which is not very apparent. The tower has no staircase in the interior.

On entering the church we at first see nothing more than a plain building communicating with the interior of the tower by a low broad arch, which is almost choked up. It is this arch which we have represented in the Engraving above; and it is there depicted, not as it at present stands, nearly hidden by an ugly organ-loft, but in the condition to which there is good reason to believe it will shortly be restored. The reader will observe that the arch shows some approach to, but is far ruder than, Norman work. The peculiar flat band, or "label," upon the face of the wall, and extending al round the arch, is not supposed to exist in any Norman building. The Engraving will convey a far better idea of the series of mouldings —if they may be so called—which follow the curve of the arch, but hardly seem as if they formed part of it, than any description. It will be observed that these "mouldings" consist of a semi-cylindrical band, situated at a distance of sixteen inches from the square edge of the arch, followed by a chaunel, and that succeeded by the flat band before spoken of, which is more than five inches in breadth, and not raised more than about two inches from the face of the wall. At the spring of the arch upon each side is a curious capital, quite unlike anything Norman, just above which an animal is rudely sculptured in low relief.

THE FRENCH OCCUPATION OF ALGERIA.

A very interesting lecture was delivered at the Literary and Scientific Institution of Frome, on the evening of the 23rd ult., by the Hon. Major Boyle, M.P., on "The French Occupation of Algeria." The chair was occupied by George Wood Sheppard, Esq. The attendance was large, and comprised an unusual number of the élite of the town.

The Hon. Major Boyle, on coming forward, was greeted with cheers. He said that, in selecting a subject, he naturally desired to fix upon one that would enable him to do justice to that noble body of men, the French army, of whom he had formed a high opinion from his experience in the Crimea. He then proceeded to give a history of Algiers, now called Algeria. The origin of the quarrels by which France had gained Algeria, and thus obtained a large accession of territory bordering on her own, had been extremely simple, but the earlier proceedings of the French Government were frightfully cruel. He intended on that occasion to confine himself to the French occupation. The Moors, notwithstanding the severe lesson they had received from the bombardment in 1816, by Lord Exmouth, were still the terror of the sea, a horde of pirates, to whom plunder was trade from their youth, and honour was unknown. The immediate cause of the dispute was a sum of £18,000, alleged to be due from the Bey, which not being forthcoming at the appointed time, he was waited on by the foreign Ministers, and in the heat of his anger the Bey struck the French Consul with his hand. As an insult to a representative is always, and justly, regarded as a sign of contempt for the country represented, the French Minister of War determined on an expedition by land and sea. On the 14th of June, 1830, a landing was effected with an army, than which there was never one in better condition. On the 4th of July the army attacked Algiers, and, aided by the fleet, brought to bear on the devoted city an immense force of artillery. A destructive explosion in the principal fort at length, after repeated overtures, induced the Bey to accept terms, which included the safety of all lives and of private property. The French had also the privilege of releasing from slavery a number of their own countrymen

The lecturer then described the peculiarities of the country, and its adaptation for colonisation. It was, he said, one of the finest wheat-producing countries in the world, and near the coasts the scenery is very beautiful. The climate in the north is cold and bleak all the year round, while in the south precisely the reverse is the case. In the summer months, so great is the heat and so scarce is water, that vegetation is parched and dried up, only to revive with the copious rains of October and November. No event of importance occurred till the year 1833, when the Arabs, gaining courage from the reduction of the numbers of the French troops, raised an insurrection under the renowned Abd-el-Kader. The lecturer gave a narrative of the extraordinary career and achievements of this veteran warrior, and the various successes and reverses of the French armies, which were dispatched for the purpose of subduing his infuriated followers.

The formation and career of the various African troops which figured prominently in the Crimea, the Zouaves, Chasseurs d'Afrique, Foreign Legion, and others, were related with much spirit, illustrated with coloured diagrams and characteristic anecdotes.

The remaining history of Algeria was a catalogue of wars and bloodshed the main memorable exploits and disastrous encounters of the Arabs and the French the lecturer graphically related, ending with the barbarous suffocation of 500 men, women, and children in a cave in which they had taken refuge, and the surrender of Abd-el-Kader. By the unfaithfulness of Louis Philippe, the engagements with him, however, were not kept, and he was imprisoned for five years, when he was set at liberty on the accession of the present Emperor of the French.

The lecturer in gave an able review of the life and character of those two eminent French Generals, Marshal St. Arnaud and Marshal Pelissier, supplying many new facts and data derived from their recently-published letters. The condition of the Algerine colony was contrasted with our own colony in Australia, greatly to the advantage of the latter. Algeria contains 134,000 European inhabitants, of whom about two-thirds inhabit towns; and also about 10,000 military. The French farmer dislikes to remove, and this accounts for the poor condition of the agricultural interest. The towns present a very curious appearance, being divided into European and Arabian. The streets of the former are wide, clean, and well paved; the latter narrow, and dirty. After describing the civil, military, and religious customs and institutions of the inhabitants, the lecturer concluded by stating his conviction that, if the colony were not in a prosperous condition, its youth was the only cause, and that Algeria was destined ultimately to produce all the benefits of a great colony to France.

The interest of the lecture was greatly increased by a large map of Algeria, on which the lecturer pointed out the chief spots of interest, and a large coloured picture of modern Algiers—for which, as well as well as the many other excellent drawings which were exhibited in the course of the evening, the lecturer was indebted to the kindness of the Hon. Mrs. Richard Boyle.

The Chairman then observed it was cause for congratulation that such a lecture had been delivered by a foreign officer, and that there had not been a syllable uttered that he could have wished suppressed and the room been half full of British officers; being, in that respect, such a contrast to the meeting which had recently been held at Paris in the hotel of the Prince Napoleon.

The thanks of the meeting were then presented to the lecturer, and to the lady who had so greatly added to their entertainment by the views of places and persons.

The original sketches from which the drawings were executed were given to the lecturer by Lord Cranbourne, who was travelling in Algeria during the summer of 1856. We have engraved one of the Sketches

We add two accompanying scenes of Algerine life from Sketches by a Correspondent.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1857.

It is a maxim of Party Government that it is a good and a wise thing to damage a political opponent. But it is also, or ought to be, a maxim that it is a bad and an unwise thing to accuse a political opponent of that which is not. Of course no gentleman would make a charge against a Parliamentary adversary, or against any other person, publicly or privately, if he knew it to be false. When Mr. Disraeli, on the first night of the Session, charged Lord Palmerston and the Government generally with being cognizant of, or parties to, a secret treaty between France and Austria, guaranteeing to the latter Power the undisturbed possession of Lombardy and Venice, the country as well as Parliament acquitted the right honourable gentleman of the charge of inventing and fabricating the story. He made it and insisted upon it, honestly, but maliciously. The explanation was that Mr. Disraeli had been somewhat too credulous, and had allowed his judgment to be imposed upon. Although this was in a high degree damaging to him in his character of a Parliamentary leader, it left his reputation as a gentleman unsullied. Nobody believed in the charge, but at the same time nobody believed that Mr. Disraeli was not thoroughly convinced of its accuracy. Mr. Disraeli, however, with a simplicity of good faith, and an almost heroic reliance upon the probity and sound judgment of the unnamed individual or individuals from whom he derived his information, reiterated on Tuesday night the accuracy of his allegation. Smarting under the ridicule with which Lord Palmerston had disposed of the charge — ridicule which he designated as "ribald"—he challenged the contradiction of the Government. He got what he wanted; and succeeded a second time in vindicating his honour and veracity at the expense of his personal discretion and his political generalship. Lord Palmerston, who would not do him the favour to be angry, as invited, showed Mr. Disraeli the manner in which he had been imposed upon, and the real dimensions of the great "mare's nest" which he had discovered; and satisfied Parliament, and the country at the same time, that the policy of the Government towards Austria, Italy, and France had been fair, open, honest, and above board in every particular. Mr. Disraeli saw—for he says he saw—a document which he imagined to be a secret treaty. But the plain tale told by Lord Palmerston proved that the document was not a treaty, but the draught of a proposed military convention, which was intended to meet certain circumstances which had never occurred, and which consequently had never been signed. When, at the end of the year 1854, it was hoped that Austria would have had sufficient dignity and courage to unite with Great Britain and France against the Czar, Austria very naturally inquired of France what course would be pursued towards her in Italy if Russia, as was probable, should endeavour to stir up revolution in Lombardy and Piedmont. Had Austria joined the Anglo-French and Sardinian alliance at that time, England, France, and Sardinia would, as a matter of course, have united to foil any Russian machinations tending to the overthrow of Austrian dominion in her most vulnerable provinces; but, as Austria never carried her good intentions into effect, the draught of the convention remained a draught—a mere piece of waste paper, of no more historical value or legal efficiency than a leader in a newspaper three years old, or a speech delivered by Mr. Disraeli in a bygone Session. Thus failed the great coup which the chief of the Opposition aimed and reaimed at the jaunty Achilles of the Ministry. For a man in his eminent position, and with his unquestionable abilities, Mr. Disraeli is by far too liable to make mistakes to be considered a good general. Were he one of the rank and file of his party such mistakes would be of no particular consequence; but, coming from the Commander-in-Chief, they are fatal to his influence and his efficiency. It is not enough for a Parliamentary leader to be honest and eloquent. Such qualities are great and essential; but, if not associated with prudence, skill, and foresight, they may fit a man to serve, but will not qualify him to command, a great party.

GOVERNMENTAL measures have been introduced into both Houses of Parliament. Sir George Grey has brought in a bill the main feature of which is that it admits that the principle of transportation of criminals is a salutary one, and that the practice cannot be dispensed with. Its own operation is limited. Western Australia is willing, and indeed desirous, to avail itself of convict labour, if we will send out able-bodied labourers; but it will not hear of female convicts being introduced into its population. The bill will enable the Government to forward the supply required, and Sir George Grey states that the Irish female convicts are much less objectionable than those of England or Scotland; and that, it being absolutely necessary to forward a proportion of both sexes to the colony, he will endeavour to meet Australian views by sending out Irishwomen. The penal-servitude sentences are also to be made more real. Sir George considers that the country entertains exaggerated ideas as to the amount of crime at present rampant. Another bill which the Home Secretary has brought in is for enabling—not compelling—localities to found reformatory institutions. This is, of course, an excellent step. It could be wished that the Home Secretary would make it part of his duty to discourage and rebuke country magistrates who sanction prosecutions for the most trivial offences, as turnip-pulling, stone-throwing, and the like, and who thereby fill the gaols with young candidates for these very reformatories. We have had too much of "Justices' justice," and require a little more of the justice of common sense.

The Lord Chancellor has brought in a bill upon the subject of the Ecclesiastical Courts. He proposes to establish a Queen's Court of Probate, with thirty district courts for proving country wills, but all disputed cases to come to London. One of the Vice-Chancellors he would make the head of the Court, and increase the number of proctors, retaining their exclusive privileges, on the ground that they do their business better than any one else could do it. His Lordship also deals mildly with the Divorce question. He adopts the most important parts of the bill of last year. A woman who has been deserted for three years is to be entitled to a divorce and to her own property. A third bill is for the better punishment of heretical or immoral clergymen, and proposes to try an offender of that class before a mixed jury of clergymen and laymen, leaving to the Bishop who summons them the duty of pronouncing judgment. There are grave objections to all three measures, on the ground of their incompleteness. The Divorce Bill is the weakest, and especially for the grave if not fatal, defect of the non-abolition of the disgusting action for damages. Lord Brougham also complained, most justly, that the hardship of refusing a woman the right to be heard in a case involving the happiness or misery of her whole subsequent life was not to be remedied. The best that can be said of these measures is that they condemn the existing systems, and prepare the way for real reforms.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty had a Privy Council on Saturday last, at which Viscount Castlerosse, Comptroller of the Queen's Household, was sworn of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council; and the Earl of Yarborough was confirmed in his appointment as Lord Lieutenant of the county of Lincoln

On Sunday the Queen and Prince, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, Princess Alice, and Princess Helena, the Princess of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, and the Princess Feodore attended Divine service in the private chapel. The visitors staying in the Castle were also at the service. The Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor officiated.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Alice, walked and drove in the Home Park. Her Majesty visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore. His Royal Highness Prince Albert attended by Lieutenant-Colonel Ponsonby, went to the Wellington College, and inspected the works in progress. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales rode out hunting. Their Serene Highnesses the Princess of Hohenlohe, Princess Feodore, and the Prince of Leiningen dined with her Majesty in the evening.

On Tuesday (the anniversary of her Majesty's marriage) the band of the 1st Life Guards played several favourite airs on the terrace at an early hour in the morning. In the evening a selection of choral and other music was performed in the music-room. The principal vocal and instrumental performers were Mdme. Clara Novello and Mdme. Bassano, Mr Sims Reeves, and Mr. Weiss.

On Wednesday the Queen and Prince walked in the Home Park His Royal Highness afterwards rode on horseback, accompanied by the Prince of Wales. The Princess Alice rode in the riding house. Prince Leiningen and Princess Feodore took a carriage drive. All the visiting company left the Castle in the forenoon; viz., the Duke of Wellington, the Earl and Countess Spencer, the Earl of Westmoreland, General Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner, and Col. Francis Seymour, C.B.

On Thursday afternoon her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, the Princess Alice, the Princesses Helena and Louisa, Prince Arthur, and Prince Leopold, left Windsor Castle, and travelled by special train on the Great Western Railway to Paddington, and proceeded in several of her Majesty's carriages, escorted by a detachment of the 3rd Light Dragoon Guards, to Buckingham Palace. In attendance on the Royal party were Lady Churchill, the Duchess of Wellington, Lord Canoys, General Sir Edward Bowater, the Master of the Household, Mr. Gibbs, &c. The directors and various officials received her Majesty at the railway. On arriving at Buckingham Palace the Royal party were received by Earl Spencer, the Marquis of Breadalbane, Lord Ernest Bruce, and others of her Majesty's household. Her Majesty will, it is believed, remain in London about three weeks, returning to Windsor some days antecedent to an approaching interesting event.

Lady Churchill has succeeded the Duchess of Wellington as Lady in Waiting to her Majesty. Lord Canoys and General Sir Edward Bowater have relinquished Lord Derby and the Hon. Mortimer Sackville West as the Lord and Groom in Waiting.

The Prince de la Moskowa, accompanied by the Baron de Vidil, arrived at the residence of the French Embassy, on Monday, from Paris. The Prince is father of the Countess de Persigny.

Lord and Lady Colville have arrived in town. The noble Lord and his amiable lady have been absent from England some months on a yachting excursion in the Mediterranean.

Baron Alphonse Rothschild has arrived at Claridge's Hotel from Paris. The marriage of the Baron with his cousin, Miss Rothschild, daughter of Baron Lionel de Rothschild, will take place at Gunnersbury on the 4th proximo.

Sir Charles Wood gave a dinner to the Cabinet Ministers on Wednesday evening, at his residence in the Admiralty. All the Ministers were present except Lord Panmure.

THE NEUFCHATEL CONFERENCE.—The Presse gives as a piece of news the fact that Paris is definitively fixed upon as the place where the Neufchâtel Conference is to be holden; but, although the Plenipotentiaries may possibly meet towards the end of the month, it thinks that the day of meeting is not yet fixed.

THE ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES.—The sum asked for the expenses of the Navy for the present financial year amounts to only £8,189,163, in place of £15,812,127, the estimate for last year. The reductions effected in the Army and Ordnance Estimates are not less striking. The total sum demanded for the year is little more than £21,600,000. The Navy and Ordnance Estimate for 1856-7 was no less than £24,998,854, and even the revised estimate when the war closed was £20,249,900. Thus, even compared with the past year of peace, the reduction is no less than £9,600,000. The cost of our military and naval defences is, therefore, reduced from £36,547,239 for 1856-7 to little more than £19,600,000 for 1857-8. The saving effected is, consequently, upwards of £17,000,000, a million more than the sum produced by the whole income-tax of 16d. in the pound.

SPEAK OUT.—The following notice has been printed with the House of Commons' votes: "To ensure accuracy and facility in taking divisions it is requested that every member, whether personally known to the division clerks or not, will give his name, distinctly and audibly, as he passes the division desk."

WE regret to announce the premature demise of the Rev. Robert T. Wilberforce, late Archdeacon of the East Riding of Yorkshire, which took place on the 3rd inst., at Albano, in the vicinity of Rome, from an attack of gastric fever.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Right Hon. W Cowper took the oaths and his seat on re-election for [illegible] consequent upon his appointment to the new office of Master of Education.

MERSEY CONSERVANCY AND DOCK BILL.—The second reading of the Mersey Conservancy and Dock Bill was opposed by Mr Horsfall on the ground that it would greatly increase the Dock Dues to be raised, and was a public grievance already felt very heavily by the shipowners of Liverpool. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the other hand, [illegible] Mr Gibson was prepared to admit that the measure was attended [illegible] to the recommendations of the Select Committee. [illegible] Lord Palmerston, as one of the Members of the House of Commons, [illegible] notice of an Act of Parliament for consolidating Liverpool and Birkenhead Docks into one Trust. Mr. Disraeli regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not given a more decided opinion on the subject. He [illegible] the House that the question in dispute involved a sum of £13,000,000, and affected the commerce of the whole civilised world. This was surely a question for the careful consideration of a Select Committee.—After a few words from Mr. Vernon, Mr Spooner, and Mr. J. Ewart, Mr. Horsfall withdrew his opposition, and the bill was read a second time.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION BILL.

The second reading of the Judgments Execution Bill was opposed by Colonel French, who objected to the proposal for giving judgments issued by an English court validity in Ireland. He moved as an amendment that the bill should be read a second time that day six months.

Mr Mahon and Mr. Bland also condemned the bill, of which Mr. Hadfield strongly approved.

Mr George and Mr Hughes opposed the bill.

The Attorney-General for Ireland supported it, believing that it would remove an anomaly which had hitherto been a disgrace and blot upon the legal system of the United Kingdom.

After some remarks in opposition to the measure from Mr. Napier, and in its defence from the Attorney-General, the House divided—For the second reading, 56; against it, 42: majority, 10.

The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Wednesday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Greece.—The Earl of Clarendon, in reply to the Marquis of Clanricarde, said it was quite true that orders had been given for the evacuation of Greece by the English and French troops, as the motive which induced the Western Powers to send those troops into the Piræus no longer existed. The Greek Government had offered to pay a small annual instalment of the loan, and had laid before the three protecting Powers a statement of its finances. In consequence of the Greek Government challenging an inquiry into the truth of this statement, it was agreed upon that a commission should be appointed, to be composed of the representatives of the protecting Powers—France, England, and Russia—to make such investigations, and, with the concurrence of the Greek Government, which had acted in the most frank and cordial manner in the business, to advise such financial reforms in the country as should be effective for the most advantageous results. As the commission had not as yet sat, he thought it would be premature to lay the papers connected with the subject before the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

New Members.—Sir W. Codrington took the oaths and his seat for the county of Wexford, for Southampton; and Mr. Kennard for Newport Isle of Wight).

The Nelson Monument.—Sir B. Hall, in reply to Mr. Warren, said it would cost about £5000 to complete the Nelson Monument in Trafalgar-square; but he was not prepared at present to ask the House to vote that sum.

The British Bank.—The Attorney-General, in reply to Mr. Bath, said he intended to introduce a bill upon the subject of the winding-up of Bankrupt Companies, and to prevent conflicts of authority between the Court of Bankruptcy and the Court of Chancery, as had occurred in the case of the Royal British Bank.

Our Relations with China.—Mr. Cobden gave notice of his intention, on an early day, to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the nature of our commercial relations with China.

SIR R. PEEL'S SALTLEY SPEECH.

Mr. A. Stafford inquired of Sir R. Peel whether the report of a speech delivered by him at Saltley, near Birmingham, on the 7th January, and reported in the Times newspaper, was correct; and particularly those portions of it which referred to the Count de Morny, the Grand Duke Constantine, and the Prince de Ligne?

Sir R. Peel said he did not think that that House was the tribunal by which he should be called to account for any expressions which he might have used upon matters altogether unconnected with the business of the House; but he was quite willing to accept the challenge of the hon. member, and to give every information in his power upon the subject referred to. He was not in the habit of reading reports of his own speeches after they were delivered; and it was very difficult for him at that distance of time to judge of the correctness of the report of every particular word, inasmuch as he had spoken for an hour and a half without making use of a note of any kind. Such, however, was the justice and candour which gentlemen generally reporting for the public journals, that he was quite prepared to accept the responsibility of the speech, with the exception of one particular phrase of a personal nature which was put into his mouth, but which he certainly did not use. He protested against the construction which had been put upon some of [illegible] it was very far from his nature to inflict pain upon any individual. With regard to the Count de Morny, he did say that the Count was one of the greatest speculators in Europe; but he had no intention of saying a single word against his character (Laughter). With regard to the Grand Duke Constantine, he certainly did say that his Imperial Highness did not impress him with the feeling of his being a frank and open-hearted sailor. The House must recollect that those words "frank and open-hearted sailor" had been first used by a gallant Admiral who sat in that House (Laughter). As regarded the Prince de Ligne, he certainly did say in rather a familiar tone that he was "stiff and starched" (Renewed laughter, but not with a view to pain him; and it seemed to him (Sir R. Peel) that he had not used a single word which might not have fallen from the lips of the most strait-laced member of that House. He did not believe that he had, if he had, he begged to offer the most ample expressions of regret for having done so (Cheers).

THE SECRET TREATY.

Lord Palmerston wished to correct a statement made by him on Tuesday night in reply to the right hon. member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli). He said that the convention between France and Austria had never been signed, and he believed so at the time. But, upon further inquiry, he ascertained that it had been signed (Opposition cheers). Being, however, in the nature of a military convention, and having for its object the [illegible] of military matters between the two countries, and the French [illegible] the contingency arising of Austria joining in active operations against Russia, and Austria never having done so, the convention became a dead letter, and never had any force whatever.

Mr. Disraeli wished to ascertain from the noble Lord whether any of the statements made by him on Tuesday night and the counter-statements made by the noble Lord, the First Minister of the Crown, on those statements made by the noble Lord, the First Minister of the Crown, on those statements made by the noble Lord, the First Minister of the Crown, on those thereby falling into all the old lady's economical habits; thirdly and lastly, if the girl is not good-tempered, industrious, and respectful in her demeanour to her intended husband and his parents, she is very quickly sent about her business without the attendant fuss which ensues when a wife is sent back to her family for misconduct after her marriage.

The parties about to contract a marriage never see each other, the whole affair being arranged by their relations, or go-betweens, which are old women, who describe the lady in the most glowing terms, or the reverse, according to the presents which are made to them. One of their customs before marriage, although synonymous with our fashion of sending a lady's portrait, is most extraordinary. As the damsel cannot be seen her shoe is sent to the gentleman, that he may be enabled to judge of the dimensions of her crippled foot—the smallness of the foot being a Chinaman's beau-ideal of perfection.

Daughters have no fortunes in China; but the man who is about to marry agrees to give a certain sum, which is laid out in clothes and jewels for the bride. The sums of money vary according to the rank of the parties; the Mandarins frequently giving six thousand taels for a wife (a tael being six and fourpence sterling), and the bride is invariably selected from a family of equal station.

The presents given to the female's parents, in the middle and lower ranks, are sometimes of a ludicrous description, according to our barbarian notions, being fat pigs, dried fish, live poultry, chests of tea, sugar-candy, preserved fruits, and such like unromantic gear; the quality and quantity of these presents is invariably agreed upon when the bargain is first struck.

The ceremony of the marriage is gone through at the bridegroom's house; upon the nuptial day the bride leaves her father's home, accompanied by a numerous train of attendants; the bride is placed in a sedan-chair, most profusely gilded, and decorated most gaily with artificial flowers of brilliant hues; attendants, bearing torches and flambeaux, surround the chair, the servant who bears the key of the precious casket walking nearest the sedan—for we must state, that no sooner is the lady seated in the chair than the door is locked by her father or nearest male relative, the key being given to the confidential servant, who has orders to deliver it only to the bridegroom. Numerous attendants precede and follow the bride's chair, carrying flags, magnificent lanterns, beating gongs, and sounding wind instruments; the ladies of the two families are in sedan-chairs, which follow the bride's; the male relatives and friends walking in the procession. There is a great display of presents of all kinds, which are to accompany the bride to her new home—these consist of ladies' dresses, borne on stands; carved chests, which are to be supposed to contain all sorts of treasures; stands, in which are placed jars containing sam-shoo, wine, and preserved fruits; cages containing the mandarin ducks, fowls, and frequently a fine fat pig, in a gaily-decorated bamboo cage, bring up the rear of the presents. The grandeur of a marriage procession is measured by the number of attendants.

CANTON WITHIN THE WALLS.

IN our Journal for Jan. 31 we illustrated the foreign quarter of Canton, where, according to a letter from the Chinese seas, dated the 16th December, and published in the Moniteur de la Flotte, some new details are given relative to the late affair at Canton, showing that the damage sustained by the foreign merchants was not as great as had been stated in the first accounts. It appears that, of thirteen quarters, of which Chy-San-Hang, the residence of the Europeans, is composed, five have been destroyed. It was said that, of the eighty foreign factories and stores which existed at Canton, only nine, including the British Consulate, escaped the conflagration. This, it states, is an error. Of the eighty establishments twenty-one have been burnt down. This is a considerable loss, no doubt, but it is much less than that reported. It appears that there existed at Canton a floating population of from 25,000 to 30,000 thieves and vagabonds—refugees from all parts of China. When the English ships commenced fire, these men, taking advantage of the alarm, rushed in large bodies into the Chy-San-Hang, and having first pillaged the European stores set fire to them. The British Admiral, seeing what was going forward, brought two of his ships to bear on the pillagers and sent some shells among them, which caused them to fly. Unfortunately the shot from the British ships increased the fire lighted by the vagabonds. The Captain of the French frigate Virginie sent a detachment of 150 men on shore, with four light howitzers, to complete the discomfiture of the pillagers, who fled in every direction, leaving a number of their body dead in the streets. The French seamen were labouring indefatigably in extinguishing the fire, which they in a great measure accomplished. As to the Chinese town, it suffered horribly, as well by the fire of the English ships as by the native robbers. Of the twelve great factories belonging to the Hong merchants, and which were situate near the Tartar town, nine were destroyed by the first attack. The English merchants interested in these establishments suffered considerably by that disaster. At the latest dates, the British Admiral, having occupied the Chinese military positions, had no more opposition to expect. A great number of merchants had emigrated to Shanghai, but the 500,000 inhabitants of Canton cannot so easily dispose of themselves.

Of the city within the walls we engrave a View from a drawing by a Chinese artist. In the left-hand foreground is the sedan, which is a general conveyance used by persons of quality in China. Of the physiognomy of the street the following is a picture: "The shops, being principally open in front, and the whole of the merchandise being thus exposed to view, present a most showy, alluring appearance to the spectator. The interior of these shops are neatly fitted up, and the goods tastefully disposed for inspection; whilst the intermixture of various-coloured paper inscriptions hanging on the walls, and variegated lanterns pendent from the roof, have an extraordinary and pleasing effect. The inscriptions and notices are generally to the following effect:—'Much talk injures business.' 'Having once been cheated, we are made cautious.' (Cheat a Chinaman in money matters! what European could accomplish a feat of that description?) 'No credit can here be given.' 'All here is sold at its true value and being good, praise is needless,' &c.

INVESTITURE OF KNIGHTS AND GRAND BANQUET IN ST. PATRICK'S HALL, DUBLIN.

George IV., in the autumn of 1821, during his famous visit to Ireland, held, on the occasion of an installation of Knights of St. Patrick, a banquet in St. Patrick's Hall, in Dublin Castle. George's St. Patrick's Banquet was one of surpassing magnificence. It was the last given until now, when Ireland's brighter and better days seem to be coming. The loyalty of the Irish people grows naturally warmer, if possible, with its fortunes; and, therefore, to celebrate the dawn of Ireland's prosperity with the restoration of the St. Patrick's Banquet in a truly sumptuous way is an additional mark of the sound sense and elegant taste of his Excellency the present Lord Lieutenant—"the good Earl of Carlisle"—to use his now not uncommon designation in Ireland.

A grand Chapter of the Most Illustrious Order of St. Patrick was held last Friday week in the Presence Chamber, Dublin Castle, for the investure of the Earl of Granard and Viscount Gough, as Knights of the Order. The occurrence of a time when the Viceregal Levee and Drawingroom drew to the now thriving city of Dublin from all parts of the country an unusually large number of nobility and gentry served to give it additional importance. Still further to enhance the éclat of the investiture arising from the worthiness of the new Knights chosen, and the presence of such an array of visitors, his Excellency, who is Grand Master of the Order, determined to restore the ancient and time-honoured custom of giving a grand banquet in St. Patrick's Hall, a practice suffered to fall into disuse since the Royal entertainment by George IV. In this revival the Lord Lieutenant afforded an additional proof of his anxiety to maintain, with national sentiment, the dignity of his high position, and at the same time to strengthen the general tone of prosperity in Ireland. It should be also mentioned that heretofore the rich flowing mantles of the Knights were made of foreign manufacture, notwithstanding that the statutes of the order prescribed they should be of material produced in Ireland. His Excellency, adhering more rigidly to the statutes, caused his own Grand Master's mantle to be made of beautiful Irish poplin. His example was followed by several of the Knights, and it is to be hoped will be soon by them all.

The ceremony, which commenced at three o'clock, was brief, but of an impressive character, and was in every particular conducted under the direction of Sir Bernard Burke, the Ulster King of Arms, in strict accordance with the statutes and precedents. The investiture fills the number of Knights prescribed—all nobles—namely, twenty-two. At the appointed hour the Lord Lieutenant, wearing the ribbon and badge of Grand Master, entered the Presence Chamber, and took his seat in the chair of office, which was placed on a dais at a table covered with crimson. At each side were the sedilia for the Knights. The Knights present were the Earl of Howth, the Marquis of Headfort, Lord Farnham, Lord Massareene, and the Marquis of Londonderry. They wore their mantles, collars, and badges. Ulster King having, by the Lord Lieutenant's command, read the Queen's letter authorising the holding of the Chapter, the Earl of Granard and Gen. Viscount Gough were forthwith invested Knights of St. Patrick.

At the close of the proceeding Ulster called over the several Knights, and they retired in the same order as they entered, bowing to the Grand Master on withdrawal

His Excellency the Grand Master then broke up the Chapter and with attended as he had entered.

The [illegible]ore in taking their departure delayed to observe the preparations which were being made in St. Patrick's Hall for the banquet that took place in the evening; and all admired the splendour and beauty of the new decorations of this noble apartment of the Castle of Dublin. The entire hall has been recently painted and ornamented and the effect produced by the soft white colour which prevails, and which is relieved by the rich gilding of the pillars, pilasters and cornices, and stucco work, is most striking. A number of large oval mirrors have been set in a corresponding numbers of panels of the inner wall, and serve greatly to enhance the general gorgeousness of this stupendous room, unequalled by anything of the kind in Buckingham or St. James's Palaces. The colouring of the frescoes and the paintings on the ceiling, known triumphs of art, have been revived. At night these artistic and tasteful decorations stand out with extraordinary brilliancy under the flood of light thrown upon them by myriads of gas chandeliers and branches bearing wax tapers.

The magnificent banquet in the evening (of which we give an illustration) was attended by little short of a hundred of the nobility and gentry. Several members of the Order of Patrick were present, including the newly-invested Knights, whose healths were proposed by the Lord Lieutenant, and drunk by the company. Amongst the company were—The Earl and Countess of Howth, Lord and the Ladies St. Lawrence, the Marquis and Marchioness of Headfort, the Marquis of Kildare, the Earl and Countess of Miltown and Lady Barbara Leeson, Lord and Lady Farnham and the Misses Stapleton, Viscount and Viscountess Massereene and the Hon. Miss Skeffington, the Marquis of Londonderry, Earl of Granard and Viscountess Forbes, Viscount and Lady Gough, Hon. Captain and Mrs. Gough, and the dignitaries and officers of the Order and of their ladies.

SOMERSET HOUSE.—THE NEW INLAND REVENUE-OFFICE.

We now complete the illustration of the Statues which adorn the new or west front of Somerset House, intended for the Inland Revenue-Office. These statues represent the three principal cities of the United Kingdom—London, Edinburgh, and Dublin.

London is represented holding a sceptre in her right hand, and in her left a wreath of laurel: she is murally crowned, and the hair falls upon the shoulders in large curls. The drapery is very boldly treated, the outer garment passing from the right arm over the shoulders, and enveloping the left arm; it is then passed over the right hip, upon which it rests, falling thence in great breadth.

The figure of Edinburgh is gracefully treated. She is attired in a rather close dress, over which is thrown a mantle, terminating on the left arm; in the left hand she has a spear, which she holds in a quiescent manner, thrown slightly forward. Like her sister, London, she is crowned with a mural crown.

Dublin is perhaps the least successful of the three statue personifications of the cities—the drapery does not hang so well. She holds in her right hand and supports on the right hip the harp of Erin; in the left hand she bears a scroll, partially unrolled. The hair is confined behind by ribbons, the ends of which fall upon the shoulders. She is also murally crowned.

The statue of London is by Legrew; and those of Edinburgh and Dublin are by Theed.

The three companion statues of Manchester, Glasgow, and Belfast, were engraved in the Illustrated London News for Nov. 1, 1856.

An Eagle amongst Cranes.—The Athhar, of Algiers, relates a strange story. A number of cranes, some days ago, alighted on the road from Orleansville to Teniet, near a spot where some soldiers were at work; and presently a large eagle, sweeping down on them, attempted to seize one; but the cranes defended and rescued their unfortunate companion. The eagle then tried to seize another, but all the cranes defended themselves vigorously, and a regular battle ensued. After it had raged for some time two ravens arrived and took the part of the cranes. The contest continued with redoubled fury, and there was no saying what would have been the result, if a soldier had not dispersed the combatants by killing one of the cranes with his sword. The fury of the conflict may be judged of from the fact that the soldier was able to get close to the cranes without being noticed. Although, however, the conflict was put an end to, the eagle seized one of the cranes and bore it off in triumph.

A Narrow Escape.—An old lady residing in one of the suburbs of Paris had complained for some short time past of pains in the head, which she could attribute to no special cause. Two days ago she pronounced to be positively unwell, and sent for her daughters, who was engaged to marry a young man who had recently left the corps of Pompiers. On the appointed day the young couple presented themselves at the residence of the old lady in the Rue de la Pompe. They found her in bed, complaining of indisposition. The young man had not been in the room many seconds before he exclaimed "Silence!" and to the astonishment of the persons present stretched himself on the floor and appeared to listen to some slight sound. This astonishment was transformed into consternation on his rising and informing the company that the rafters were on fire, and had been probably burning for days past. Water was instantly supplied in abundance, the flooring torn up, and the fire extinguished. It was found that several of the beams were completely calcined, and that in a few hours more very probably the flooring would have crumbled away. The indisposition of the old lady must have been caused by the heaviness of the air produced by the smouldering fire.—Siècle.

MUSIC.

The brilliant and successful concert of the Amateur Musical Society, on Monday evening, afforded a fresh proof of the progress made by the fashionable world in the cultivation of music. Without going back to the days of Lord Chesterfield, who, while gaming, drinking, dancing, flattering, and debauching were quite comme il faut, denounced music as an amusement unfit for a gentleman, and advised his son, if he wanted music, to "hire a fiddler, but never to fiddle himself"—without going quite so far back, we can remember the time when "a concert of amateurs" was never mentioned, but as the subject of satirical jokes—as the type of everything that was tiresome and ridiculous. Nowadays nous avons changé tout cela. Amateurs, male and female, make themselves prédécents in the art without derogation to their position in the world, and the practice of an elegant and refined accomplishment enters largely into the social pleasures of high and fashionable life. The most illustrious modern musicians have studied them art as amateurs—Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer are two out of many instances. And in London, at the present time, we have amateurs, both ladies and gentlemen, who are able to contest the palm, as composers and performers, with our best professional artists. The orchestra of the society we are speaking of—nearly a hundred strong—is filled with men of rank and wealth—men eminent in the arts and the liberal professions, who willingly obey the baton of the gifted young amateur whom they have chosen to "rule over them." The result of their practice and discipline is more and more apparent. Without having as yet acquired all the aplomb and precision of regular troops, they are not greatly deficient even in this respect, while their own ardour imparts a warmth and freshness to their performances which is exceedingly agreeable. We must observe, however, that this society make a mistake almost universally prevalent. Their orchestra, like every other great orchestra that we know, is too large, and would be too large even if made up of professional players. The well-known dictum of Beethoven (on such a subject an authority without appeal) is quite decisive—that a concert-room orchestra, even for the grandest of his own symphonies, ought not to be more than sixty strong. This number is quite sufficient for real power to exist; it is only to produce noise, confusion, and real weakness. Were the society to diminish their band—not by excluding any of their performing members altogether from the orchestra, but by employing them in turn—they would soon discover the great advantages of the measure. At the concert of Monday last the great features of the evening were Haydn's symphony in B flat (No. 8 of the Salomon set), and Rummel's panoforte concerto in A flat, performed by "Angelina." The symphony was played with a degree of fire which made up for occasional clumsiness in smoothness and delicacy. Had a few of the superfluous violins and basses been absent, the performance would have been irreproachable. When the band came to accompany Hummel's concerto, the stringed instruments were considerably thinned, and the effect was most satisfactory. The fair young pianist (whom we have often mentioned, and who is now well known in the musical world) made good her claim to be regarded as an artist of the first class. In tone, execution, expression, and style, her performance was exquisite, and well deserved the thunders of applause with which it was received. Miss Leffler, a young vocalist of great promise, sang Flatti's pretty canzonet, "La Ricordanza," with an obligato accompaniment on the violoncello, very gracefully executed by Lord Gerald Fitzgerald, son of the Duke of Leinster. A march, composed by this young nobleman, was performed with great spirit and effect. It brought to mind Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," and the March in "Athalie;" but it showed no small skill in the difficult art of orchestral writing. Several fine part-songs, admirably sung by the male voices of Mr. Leslie's choir, formed the remainder of this very excellent concert. The room, as usual, was crowded with the most fashionable company in London.

Miss Arabella Goddard has begun a series of soirées at her residence in Welbeck-street, and the first was given on Tuesday evening. We need scarcely tell our musical readers that this young lady has proved herself one of the greatest pianists of the day, not in England only, but in Europe. In some particulars, executive power especially, we are inclined to regard her as actually unrivalled, while she is largely gifted with the genius, intelligence, and feeling of a true artist. Her various performances on this occasion were delightful specimens of her versatility and intellectual culture. Three of the greatest masters in the most various styles; and in the works of Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin, and Heller, she was equally at home. Her great selection Beethoven's sonata in E major, Op. 109—a performance which filled the room with wild admiration, but with unbounded astonishment. In the concerted music she was assisted by Mr. Blagrove, Herr Goffrie, and Mr Horatio Chipp; and several classical vocal pieces were beautifully sung by Madame Endersohn

The Queen had a great concert, at Windsor Castle, on Tuesday evening, which calls for special notice, not only on account of the splendour with which it was got up, but of the taste and recherché shown by her Majesty and her Royal Consort in the selection of the music. The performers were about 60. The instrumentalists were the Queen's private band, reinforced by some of the principal performers of the Philharmonic Society; and the chorus was selected from Her Majesty's Theatre, the Royal Italian Opera, and the Sacred Harmonic Society. The principal performers were Madame Clara Novello, Madame Bassano, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Weiss. Mrs. Anderson was the pianist. Mr. Anderson, the director of the private band, conducted the concert. The first part was made up entirely of [illegible] compositions. Part II. was [illegible] great and [illegible] which [illegible] little known to the public. The second part consisted of Weber's overture to "Tancredi," Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," sung by Madame Clara Novello, and Beethoven's Choral Fantasia for the pianoforte, solo voices, and chorus. This last piece, remarkable for the peculiar manner in which Beethoven unites for the first time the powers of instrumental and vocal music, used to be often played by Mrs Anderson before the long interruption (caused by her severe accident) to her appearance in public. From this performance at Windsor we may presume that the cause of the interruption no longer exists, and that we may hope for the reappearance of one of our most accomplished artists.

An excellent concert was given at Eton College on Monday evening last, by Mr. W. G. Cusins, the organist of her Majesty's private chapel. There was a numerous assemblage, including Dr. Hawtrey, the Head Master of Eton, M. and Madame Van de Weyer, and all the notabilities of the neighbourhood. The principal pieces were Mendelssohn's trio in D minor for the piano, violin, and violoncello, played by Messrs. Cusins, Remenyi, and Schroeder; Mr. Cusins's barcarolle, "Gently row, gondolier," sung by Miss Dolby, and encored; Thalberg and De Beriot's duet from the "Huguenots," played by Messrs. Cusins and Remenyi; Beethoven's great trio in B flat for the piano, clarinet, and violoncello, performed by Messrs. Cusins, Williams, and Schroeder; and a violin fantasia of Ernst's, played by M. Remenyi. This young performer is principal violin in the Queen's private band. He is not yet known to the public, but his powers as a violinist are of the highest order.

Beaumont Institution.—The third concert under the direction of Mr. D. Francis took place on Monday, Feb. 9, and gave general satisfaction to a crowded audience. The principal artistes engaged were Miss Poole, Miss Poole, the Misses Brougham, Miss St. Amand, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Carder, and Mr. Frank Mori as conductor. Miss Poole gave in a charming manner "The Young Mountaineer," by Auber; also the Irish old song, by Dr. Arne, "Fair Young Goody." Miss L. Vinning sang very effectively "Ernani involami," and was loudly applauded in "The Syren's Song," by Frank Mori. Mr. Sims Reeves, in "All is lost," displayed intense pathos and refinement in "Dalla sua pace," by Mozart. The magnificent voice and manly style told with an effect rarely heard in the concert-room. It was loudly redemanded; and, notwithstanding the immense exertion, he substituted "My pretty Jane." Miss St. Amand showed great promise in a solo on the piano; and "Blow gentle gales" was effectively sung by Miss Poole, the Misses Brougham, Mr. Rosenthal, and Mr. Thomas.

Mdme. Grisi has just concluded a brief series of performances at Liverpool, under the direction of Mr. Beale. The success of Mdme. Grisi in the "Trovatore," aided by Signor Vaipini (the new and already-distinguished tenor), has been triumphant.

Rossini, after his long and brilliant career, is said to have ended by losing all interest in the art to which he owes everything. This we hope is not true; and, indeed, is contradicted by an occurrence mentioned by the Paris correspondent of the Musical World, that Rossini has just presented Madame Alboni with his portrait, enhancing the value of the gift by the following graceful inscription:—"Offert à Marietta Alboni, Contessa di Pepoli, par son maître et ami, Gioacchino Rossini. Paris, le 15 Janvier, 1857."

THE THEATRES, &c.

Haymarket.—A new three-act drama was produced at this theatre on Saturday, and promises to achieve a more than ordinary popularity. Not that it is an original piece, or novel in its elements, but that it illustrates with more than usual variety the opposition growing in modern life more and more intense between the material and intellectual instincts that govern the different classes of society. We have here the monetary interest antagonised by the artistic, and at last yielding, not only to its moral superiority, but its physical triumph. The title of the new drama is "Double-faced People, and it is indebted for its plot and incident to a French vaudeville by MM. Théodore Barrière and Ernest Capindu, entitled "Les Faux Bonhommes." The social antagonism at which we have hinted is mainly carried on between George Medley, an artist (Mr. W. Farren), and Mr. Jonathan Vastle (Mr. Chippendale), a speculator, whose daughter Emily (Mrs. E. Fitzwilliam) has won the affections of the portrait-painter. He has, however, a rival in a Mr. Augustus Pike (Mr. E. Villiers), more to the liking of the father from the similarity of his pursuits. Pike, with his friend Snipp (Mr. Braid), engages in a bubble company, which, of course, fails; but, meanwhile, in the paternal estimation he is the favourite wooer. Medley has a temporary advantage in having a millionaire for his uncle, one Moneyles (Mr. Rogers); but the latter, preferring the Stock Exchange to the studio, withdraws his patronage from his nephew until Medley consents to take his place among the competitors of Capel-court. By this time, according to the prevailing taste he obtains Vastle's acquiescence in his marriage with Emily and a dowry of twenty thousand pounds. Pike, accordingly, puts up for the younger daughter, Fanny (Miss Reynolds)—whom, however, he is not able to wed, owing to the unfortunate affair with Scrupp. She falls to the share of Mr. Scrummill, a caricaturist (Mr. Buckstone), who employs his time in taking eccentric likenesses of "double-faced people," and these form the materials of an interesting scrap-book. Old Vastle is ultimately ruined by his speculations, and becomes dependent on the bounty of Medley, who has saved his wife's dowry and succeeded in his profession. We could have wished that the moral, however successful, had been less of an art-drama. The exceptional nature of the artist's work deprives the moral of the piece of that universality which we should have preferred on account of its wider usefulness. Work versus Speculation would have been a more sympathetic theme, and the heart of the commonality would have beat in response to its appeal. It is time to come out from studios, libraries, and laboratories, and mingle with the people in the ordinary occupations of life. The drama will yet do this. Suffice it for the present that the play before us is good, is well acted, and wholesome both in its tone and spirit.

Olympic.—A new farce, by Mr. Bayle Bernard, was produced on Wednesday, and achieved an extraordinary triumph. It is entitled "A Splendid Investment," and has the merit of being as original and not a translated production. The scene is the Belle Vue at Ramsgate, to which Titus Fulgent (Mr. Robson) comes for pleasure, and meets with various annoyances, all connected, however, with his own domestic and pecuniary arrangements, which are thus ultimately settled at a place of public resort. All this is naturally enough brought about, and exhibits Mr. Robson in various phases of comic emotion, and many odd situations, some of a farcical and others of an almost tragic character. Titus Fulgent has, in fact, invested the sum of a thousand pounds on the chance of a Mr. Rockingham (Mr. G. Vining) being married to a certain young lady, having been induced to make the advance by the offer of fifty per cent and the representation of a regular lawyer. Rockingham, however, is not married; but comes, in fact, to Ramsgate in the company of one who has eloped with him, and pleads with Titus to assist them in escaping from their pursuers. Titus sees there is little probability of getting back his loan unless the marriage is accomplished, and becomes a party in the affair. Then follow the jealousy of Titus Fulgent, and his interview with the young lady's aunt (who turns out to be his best customer), and a number of other perplexities, all of which keep Mr. Robson in a perpetual motion and the house in constant laughter. At length Fulgent is worked up to the pitch of tragic rage with Rockingham, and a scene ensues which must be seen to be appreciated. In a word, the farce is a capital one, and is capitally acted.

Astley's.—The equestrian transformation that our Shakspearean drama has been doomed to undergo at this house has at length extended beyond the legitimate five-act play, and now includes the musical production of "Rob Roy," which has been placed on the stage with great completeness, the choruses and songs being given in their entirety, and many effects and a peculiar mode of illustration adopted. Captain Thornton now boasts of a well-mounted troop, and Rob himself has a real horse to leap from on making his escape across the river. However irregular such a plan of reproducing the favourite pieces of the stage may be, its tendency is beneficial, inasmuch as it raises the standard of histrionic ambition at a theatre not previously celebrated for its exhibition. Mr. Holloway showed his usual judgment in the performance of the character of Rob Roy, and the songs were capitally sung by Mr. Rhodes in the part of Francis Osbaldiston. The Dougal-creature, also, was correctly impersonated by Mr. Hemmings; while the Bailie found a good representative in Mr. Anson. That the dramatic education of the people is in progress may be proved by the felt expediency that induces the management at all theatres to make choice of the best dramas for their various methods of illustration.

Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul, who have just concluded a lengthened and prosperous engagement in Birmingham, are announced to give their comic and musical entertainment, "Patchwork," in Cheltenham on Friday evening next.

The "Revue de Paris."—A Paris correspondent of the Cross, assures the readers of that journal that Count Hatzfeldt had no share whatever in the "suspension" of the Revue de Paris. He says that the suspension was ordered exclusively by the Minister of Public Safety, and submitted direct to the Minister of the Interior on the day when the article against Prussia appeared. This denial, the origin and object of which is sufficiently evident, needs with no comment at this place. It is well known to all persons connected with the press, and having the slightest knowledge of literary police arrangements on both sides, that both governments have come to understanding in regard to all articles unpalatable to one or the other as will ensure repression without the necessity of application to that effect on the part of resident envoys. It is undeniable, meantime, that the change in the constitution guaranteeing freedom of the press in Prussia has become a dead letter, and that the arbitrary proceedings of the literary police, under the immediate command of the Home Minister, are more arbitrary, vexatious, and repressive than they were when the censorship was in full bloom.—Letter from Berlin.

France and French Politics in the Present Day.—The present feeling in our days is to see on all sides only hopes baffled, illusions destroyed, and disappointments; and, in truth, all that we have seen and experienced is of a nature to give us a sad notion of social and human destiny. Where we look for strength we have found weakness. A premature decay or a violent end has overtaken all that appeared as a long future. The greatest warriors have been vanquished; the wisest politicians have failed; the noblest institutions have been overthrown. We have lived in the midst of ruins. But the passion for love of science and of truth has not been weakened; the conquests of mind alone have remained durable, and the power of intellect has alone stood erect amid fallen greatness. It is a clear indication of the way by which we may always be sure of security and of solid success. France has more than once seen her fortune fall her in her agonies, and found a free government. Sad, but not disheartened, she has sought and found for a space in the strength of her moral activity other sources of gratification.—M. Guizot's Speech of the Prince Peschini.

THE HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY.

MR. LABOUCHERE, the Colonial Secretary, has received the sanction of the House of Commons to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into and report upon the monopoly enjoyed by the Hudson's Bay Company over one-half of the North American Continent. It is a remarkable fact that the privileges of exclusive trade should be continued to an association having a capital of only £400,000, held by about 232 proprietors, after Government deemed it just and politic to extinguish the charter of the East India Company. So monstrous a grievance would not be tolerated for a single Session if the true state of the case were known to the constituencies. Many complaints have been made against Scottish landowners for shutting up the Highland glens, that they may amuse themselves with the sport of deer-stalking during a few weeks in the year; but what terms of censure are too strong to be applied to a company who retains millions of acres in the state of a wilderness that they may derive profit from selling the skins and furs of wild animals? It ought to be made known to the working classes of this country, who desire to improve their condition of emigrating to a British colony, that in the regions over which the Hudson's Bay Company exercise unlimited sway there are within the reach of industry 500,000 square miles richly endowed by nature, and capable of sustaining in comfort the whole population of the United Kingdom. It is true that in the districts proximate to the Arctic Circle life can only be sustained under perpetual hardship, but there is no necessity for man to seek a new home so far to the north. Experience has proved the extreme fertility of the land in the neighbourhood of the Red River, and thence to the frontiers of Canada, along the line of rivers and lakes which connect Lake Winnipeg with Lake Superior. Of that district Sir George Simpson speaks in the strongest language, as rich in the varied produce of the earth in its wild and uncultivated luxuriance. Of the country between Lake Winnipeg and Lake Superior, Sir Alexander Mackenzie says:—

> There is not, perhaps, a finer country in the world for the residence of civilised man than that which occupies the space between Red River and Lake Superior; fish, venison, fowl, and wild rice are in great plenty; the fruits are strawberries, plums, cherries, hazelnuts, gooseberries, currants, raspberries, pears, &c.

Mr. James Edward Fitzgerald gives the following information:—

> The Saskatchewan River is navigable for boats and canoes, almost from its source in the Rocky Mountains, throughout a course of 1400 miles, to the mouth, where it discharges itself into Lake Winnipeg. There is, it appears, but one rapid throughout the whole course, and this could readily be overcome. Along this magnificent river, then, is manifestly the highway to our possessions on the shores of the Pacific; and thus we have a communication opened which no other part of the continent possesses. With the exception of a few obstructions, which labour and ingenuity would soon overcome, there is water carriage the whole way from London to the Rocky Mountains; and the sources of the Saskatchewan on the one side, and of the Columbia on the other, are so close together, that Sir G. Simpson could fill his kettle for breakfast out of both at the same time. He says they are not above fourteen feet apart. It can not but be obvious to all that there is a vast object to be gained by opening up the interior of the American continent, and securing, as soon as possible, an overland communication with the Pacific.

The forty-ninth parallel of latitude, running straight across the continent from the Lake of the Woods to Vancouver's Island, separates the British possessions in North America from those of the United States; and Vancouver would form the terminus of the great overland route from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean—an enterprise of the greatest importance, as the whole line would run through British territory; and without such a communication from Canada to the Pacific it is difficult to believe, knowing the spirit of annexation which animates our republican neighbours, that we can retain our rule over that portion of the North American continent known as the "Indian territories."

What obstructs the execution of such a work? Why do these naturally fertile lands remain sterile? How happens it that the steam-vessel does not navigate these noble lakes, or pass up and down these mighty rivers? Because it is the direct pecuniary interest of the Hudson's Bay Company to perpetuate the solitude that now exists, to retain the land in forest and in jungle, to exclude man and propagate wild beasts. All their anxiety centres in an annual supply of furs and peltries; and crops of corn on the fields and commercial steamers on lake and river are incompatible with the growth and extensions of beavers and squirrels, foxes and polecats. Hence, that they may reap dividends from their monopoly, 500,000 square miles of cultivable soil are retained in the condition of a wilderness. Sound policy would unite the whole country to Canada.

The company pretend to hold the territory by virtue of a charter from King Charles II., dated in the year 1670, in which he gave to certain individuals a huge tract of territory vaguely denominated "Rupert's Land," with the geography of which the royal donor was unacquainted; and the company have interpreted the charter to mean unacquainted; and the company have interpreted the charter to mean that they may reap dividends from their monopoly, 500,000 square miles of cultivable soil are retained in the condition of a wilderness. Sound policy would unite the whole country to Canada.

The company pretend to hold the territory by virtue of a charter from King Charles II., dated in the year 1670, in which he gave to certain individuals a huge tract of territory vaguely denominated "Rupert's Land," with the geography of which the royal donor was unacquainted; and the company have interpreted the charter to mean nothing less than the countries the waters of which flow into Hudson's Bay. It is, however, denied that England had any legal title to the territory at the date of this conveyance. It was claimed by France in 1598, when Henry IV. in that year appointed the Marquis De la Roche Lieutenant-Governor of Canada, Hochelaga, Terreneuves, Labrador, &c. In 1627 Cardinal Richelieu formed the "Company of New France," that is of Canada; and in 1632, by the Treaty of St. Germain en Laye, Charles I. of England resigned to Louis XIII. of France all his claims to the sovereignty of Acadia, and Canada generally, and particularly of Cape Breton, Quebec, and Port Royal. It is certain that the French Fur Company was established forty years before the Hudson's Bay Company, and it is said that their voyageurs, or hunters of furs and peltries, traversed the country north-west of the Canadas up to the Saskatchewan River. The Treaty of Ryswick, signed in 1697, conveyed, if not the whole, very nearly the whole, of the territory claimed by the company under the charter of 1670; and thus, even had their prior claims been well founded, they were extinguished by that treaty. The authority of Mr Bancroft, the historian of the United States, ought to be decisive on this point. He writes thus:—

> In America, France retained all Hudson's Bay, and all the places of which she was in possession at the beginning of the war; in other words, with the exception of the eastern moiety of Newfoundland, France retained the whole coast and adjacent islands from Maine to beyond Labrador and Hudson's Bay, besides Canada and the valley of the Mississippi.

It is then clear that, from the date of the Treaty of Ryswick, in 1697, down to the treaty of Utrecht, signed in 1714, the territories of Hudson's Bay remained in possession of the French. By the Treaty of Utrecht they were made over to England. These facts prove, beyond doubt or cavil, that these pretensions of the Hudson's Bay Company, based on the charter of 1670, are unfounded. Nor should it be forgotten that their original privileges were qualified by the condition of their attempting to discover a north-west passage into the Pacific Ocean, and that duty they grossly neglected.

Shall this company retain its monopoly in these days of Free-trade? We have seen that its whole capital is but £400,000, to develop the resources of one-half of the North American continent. They only employ one thousand white servants. All the imports and exports annually of the whole country east of the Rocky Mountains are contained in two ships of about 300 tons each; and two ships more are employed on the north-west coast. The Russian Fur Company are far more active, for they have in their service twelve armed vessels. We shall watch the proceedings of the Select Committee with deep interest; nor can we doubt that, in their report, they will disapprove of the renewal of the exclusive license to trade with the Indians, and recommend that the whole country be thrown open to the invigorating competition of unfettered enterprise.

THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

THE exhibition of the works of British artists opened on Monday to the public. This being the first exhibition of the year is always to us fraught with pleasant anticipations. Mr. Haghe calls "Nature's second course;" here, however, it is a foretaste of the fine abundance that Nor'land can bring and imagination. The opening of the gallery to the involuntary prisoner in London during the winter is regarded very much as our country friends look upon the promise of the early blossom, and he seeks the sunny side of Pall-Mall with somewhat the feelings as they go to look for the springing of the first snowdrop and the ring of the earliest crocus. The present collection requires, we must confess, something above its ordinary excellence to enhance its value and render us unmindful of its general mediocrity, but we welcome it for the earnest it gives of the rich May-wreath we shall have by-and-by.

That the exhibition is less exclusive and no longer an arena-room to the R. I. alone now was intended to be, was established by the association, when there being now many other galleries where artists can exhibit, so that the average quality of this collection is not, and, consequently, first-rate pictures are rarely to be met with, and second-rate works here. One consequence is that a great many in the catalogue have no names on the frames to which they belong. In our remarks, therefore, we shall not exactly follow the order of precedence which the numbers given to the pictures confer, but notice those pictures first which have the most novel interest—which will furnish subjects for conversation—to those, we the "news" of the Exhibition.

The picture, then, displaying most invention is, perhaps, "Mr Pope Reciting his Couplets to his Housekeeper" (126), by Mr Hall. Boileau tells us that Molière used to read his comedies and farces to Laforêt his housekeeper (whom he selected from his goodly train of domestics for her good sense and judgment), and when he perceived the reader's laughable situation did not cease but humbly to attend or rebuke, he took the mark of her approbation never had any success. In the picture Mr Pope is just read a passage which has driven the worthy housekeeper into a violent fit of laughter that she is obliged to hold her sides, and it threatens to destroy the prim propriety of her stiffly-starched cap, &c. She is altogether a very piquant figure with her various appointments and official bunch of keys. The sly delight of Molière, and the domestics stealthily listening at the door, are equally felicitous. Breadth is somewhat sacrificed in the amount of individualised detail, but the accessories are of the period, and well and carefully painted. This artist's amusing picture of last year, "Swift and the Messenger," may be remembered, but this is a considerable advance.

"The Pliant Hour" (180), by Mr. Frith, R.A., represents Desdemona giving the modest hint, upon hearing Othello's story, which first gave him hope. The intensity of passion with which the Moor leans forward and gazes with suspended breath into the downcast eyes, trying to read in them the depth of meaning he scarce dares attach to the words he hears, is very happily expressed.

"A Moment of Royalist Cavalry at the Battle of Edgehill" (76), Mr. Gilbert has surpassed all his recent efforts. The spectator (at the proper distance) cannot fail to appreciate how cleverly the figures are subdued in force, from the rich group of trumpeters and kettle-drummers on the left, whose bold impasto brings them at once forward, to the most indistinct figure in the distance, through an immense number of intermediate gradations marked with fine feeling for aerial perspective. The soldiers' expectancy of the impending order to charge is also admirably conveyed.

Mr. Louis Haghe gives us a part of a soldiers and ladies seated at an old-fashioned casement, through which a chequered sunbeam pours after struggling through the surrounding foliage. Each one of the group is engaged singing, playing, chatting, or flirting, and the artist has given the picture the appropriate title of "Sunny Hours" (2).

Mr E. A. Goodall presents us some fruits of his recent journey to the Crimea. In No. 32—a view in Constantinople—there is a rich flush of Eastern colour mantling over the scene; and in a larger picture, "The Fish-market, Rome" (30), there is some fine Southern suffused light. Mr Rubio makes Tom resp..nting of a fish in one of his pictures the first evidence of his sense of colour, and here we might make Mr. Goodall's fishes with their opalescent tints a touchstone for his artistic discolour. The old brick wall, with its stucco scaling off, was evidently painted on the spot.

Mr. H. Weigall sends from Rome a painting (No. 443), with a quotation from Dante, which, paraphased in plain English, expresses the sentiment that "there is no more bitter ingredient in the cup of misery than the remembrance of a happier time." To illustrate which this promising young artist has painted a female figure of that noble type which one likes to imagine was ancient Roman. She has sought in the sadness of evening some ivy-covered ruin on the Campagna, and the thought of her country's former greatness contrasted with its present abjectness, causes a tear to start and tremble even in the fire of that haughty eye. The artist has chosen his model probably from the Trastevere, at Rome, where one may now occasionally see such forms, and our readers will remember that the Trasteverini cherish the notion that they are direct descendants from the ancient Romans. This, therefore, makes the emotion of the figure the more touching and probable. "A Water-Carrier of Cervara (434) and "Corinne" (42), by the same artist, are well worthy of attention.

Apropos of Romans, Mr. Buckner sends a "Roman Boy" (343), very sweet in expression, and the long silken fringes of eyelashes are true enough, but otherwise there is little of local character or even of actual out-of-door nature. It has too much of the mere conventional prettiness of fashionable portrait-painting. In amusing contrast to this is the very unsophisticated "Italian Boy" (390) of Mr George Lance. In another picture by Mr Buckner, "The Pet Rabbit" (22), we find the artist much more at home, containing as it does three portraits. The composition is strictly en règle, and the style of portraiture founded on the best authorities.

"Rain Coming On" (82), by Mr. Dawson, has some striking natural effect. The earth is quivering in the warm exhalations from the recent rain, the water trembles from the patter of which has broken its surface into small dancing wavelets; and the leaves reflect a thousand watery twinkling lights as they catch the cool rays from the azure opening in the sky. We can only object that the retiring distance looks too much like a distant mountain.

Mr. Fisher, in his picture of "Norma" (486), is ambitious in attempting to represent such intensity of passion. His work contains, however, indications of high qualities. Some artists are above advice; but we intend anything but being uncomplimentary when we suggest that the lips of "Norma" are scarcely retracted enough to express the writhing of her agony. Some very apposite remarks upon the importance of this retraction of the lips in expression may be found in Sir C. Bell's "Anatomy of Expression." Perhaps, also, the mastoideus muscle of the neck is a little too prominent—the head being thrown back. We expect still better things from Mr. Fisher.

A painting (No. 255) by Mr. Wolf shows extraordinarily close observation of nature. Its subject is a "covey" of grouse seeking shelter and warmth under a stunted shrub, the ground being covered with snow. All the objects visible have a peculiar stark distinctness which is very noticeable sometimes in severely cold weather, especially when seen near and against the spotless snow. The nestling of the birds, their watchful, half-closed, dusky, ringed eyes, and the hardy goldfinch, still lustily leaping about, are all astonishingly true to nature.

Mr Jutsum's picture is clear in atmosphere as ever; as pure in colour, and as thoroughly English in character. Such a piece of scenery as his "Hayfield" (197), with its green swaths, its translucent tints of air, and its sea of distance, is quite refreshing after the brown horrors which used to be ticketed, "English Landscapes." "The Devonshire Coast" (3), by the same artist, is enough to improve one's health even to look at.

Mr. Johnson's "Amalfi" (310) is a very forcible representation of that bold and precipitous coast, gradually eaten away by the hungry waves, which formed, together with the surrounding mountains, the great defence of the once proud and powerful mediæval Republic.

There is some spirit in the "Roll of Battle Abbey" in "Lunching Scene in the Highlands" (96), by Mr. Bottomley. The colour is good, and the freedom of handling imitative of the hair of the dogs' coats is very suggestive.

Mr. Duncan has given us one of the gallant tough old-fashioned sea-fights—the action between the frigate Penelope and the French national ship Guillaume Tell (75). We regret that Mr. Duncan could not find an equally stirring incident in our more recent naval annals; but we fear he could not.

Mr. Telbin shows great command over the resources of his palette and extreme vigour of manipulation. Some of his effects in "Venice" (462) are quite Turneresque in their beautiful passages of colour.

Mr. Dillon's picture, "The Colossal Pair, Thebes" (1), will not fail to attract attention. One of these Colossi is the celebrated vocal statue of Memnon. It has now, however, no utterance, real or imaginary, for the sun has sunk behind the distant hills. It seems, indeed, never to have welcomed him or mourned his departure, one only of the innumerable days in the three thousand years of its existence; but to be, on the contrary, the very type of eternal silence and death. The camel's (?) skeleton in the foreground, the wide desolation of the desert, the long murky shadows gradually rising, all heighten this effect. The only ray of hope seems to emanate from one bright star shining clearly in the dark blue sky. Another picture by Mr. Dillon, "A Scene in Cairo" (280), did not please us so much, chiefly in respect to its horny colouring. Surely the grand Cairo of the Caliphs has a brighter sun than this, and is even now something more picturesque and animated!

In "Beautiful in Death" (32)—a dead peacock, by Mr Lance—is a feat of imitative skill which the artist has often performed. One cannot, however, help admiring afresh the patient and faithful rendering of the gradual rise of the rich flood of feathers from where they closely overlap each other, like fish-scales, to where the green eyes begin to peep out; and thence to the fully-expanded feather, wantonly waving its green and orange light, and radiating its golden filaments. "Fruit" (109) by the same painter, is also, as usual, gorgeous and rich in colour, massive and forcible in effect. By Mr. Duffield there is, too, a picture of "Fruit" (268), of rare excellence.

While speaking of still-life we must not forget Miss Mutrie's "Cactus, &c" (295). There is a story of Titian—too poetical, though, we fear, to be true—that, when a mere child, he commenced painting by expressing the juice from flowers for his first colours. Miss Mutrie, however, must, we think, have extracted from the great Mexican cactus its very blood to have realised its flaming intensity so perfectly. It "kills" outright, as artists express it, all the unlucky pictures in its vicinity, or makes them look very sickly and feeble.

Mr. Cooke, A.R.A., contributes several little views in Italy and Venice, painted with more or less finish; but some of the latter are as clear and truthful as Canaletti, and resembling him also in tone. There are a few more works, chiefly landscapes, which have equal claims upon our attention, but want of space compels us to defer further remarks till next week.

SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.—We have the satisfaction to learn that, on Monday last, Mr. Samuel Read (with whose picturesque drawings our readers are familiar) was elected a member of the Society of Painters in Water-Colours.

THE HAUNTS OF LOVE.

A VALENTINE.

THE wintry winds have breathed their last,
New songs are sung in the caves;
Old snows along the roof-tree melt,
Feeding the unborn leaves:
A soul of gladness, banished long,
Breathes out from glade and glen;
And Love, the Spirit, glides abroad,
Haunting the paths of men.

I dare not meet that face divine
Alone, where mortals throng;
Clasp thine unsullied hand in mine,
Then shall my soul be strong.
We two upon his steps will steal,
By moor and tangled maze,
Nor leave one haunt of Love unsought,
Through all his spirit-ways.

There beats no heart in nature's world
But owes him tender duty;
No spot of all the earth but owns
The magic of his beauty.
Where dwells the eagle, mountain-born,
His voice the upland thrills;
The clondlands roll beneath his feet,
For Love is on the hills!

The fretted boughs in forests hoar
No more in angry seeming
Lash the dead silence into storm;
They mark his radiance streaming:
A quickened hum of stirring leaves
On all the branches broods;
Sweet rivers flood their sapless veins,
For Love is in the woods!

In ocean's bed the raging seas
Strong in their stormy will,
Sink, awed before his mighty wing;
They hear him, and are still:
With heaving bosom, rapt and mute,
The charmèd waters sleep;
They feel his power through all their tides,
For Love is on the deep!

But closer dwells in human hearts
The all-immortal spirit;
There, clothed in youth eternal, lives
The Love we all inherit:
Quits he the mountain eagle's haunt,
Leaves he the forest bare,
Yields he the wild waves to their will,
We'll seek, and find him there.

THE ALLEGED RUSSIAN NOTE ON THE AFFAIR WITH PERSIA.—The Nord, which speaks with some authority upon matters involving the policy of the Russian Government, says:—"Certain journals have asserted, but during the last few days, that the Cabinet of St. Petersburg had addressed to its representatives at foreign Courts a circular note relative to the affairs of Persia. As for such a circular note, it does not exist. We do not certainly mean to say, that the Cabinet of St. Petersburg may not have spoken of that matter, as of many other matters, in its ordinary diplomatic correspondence, or that it may not have expressed the view which it takes of that question. A partial or entire communication of these despatches may have been made to the Cabinets which are interested in the question, by the Russian representatives who are accredited to them; but as to a circular note, setting forth a plan of conduct and a fixed decision, there has been no such thing."

MR. HART, THE AMERICAN SCULPTOR, AND HIS INVENTIONS.

THE public is well acquainted with the name and the works of Mr Power, who is now located in Florence, and whose admirable busts are considered superior to those of Bartolini, his predecessor in the Tuscan capital; to say nothing of the "Greek Slave," and other works of an ideal character. Unless we are much mistaken, Mr. Hart, the subject of this notice, is also a man of extraordinary faculties, uniting conceptions of truth and grace in his profession with powers of mechanical ingenuity that reach far beyond the limits of the ordinary sphere of the artist.

Mr. Hart was born in Clarke County, Kentucky, and has sprung from a race of hardy backwoodsmen, who, in that region, have none of the division of labour which exists in Europe or in the more settled portion of the Atlantic seaboard. Able and willing to turn his hand to anything, Mr Hart practised successively agriculture, carpentry, turning, brassfounding, and, subsequently, drawing and sculpture; so that he is not only an artist, but a mechanic, practical and inventive, and a very ingenious one. When we add that his leisure time, instead of being spent at the tavern, as is usual in those woodland communities, was devoted to the highest departments of literature—poetry and ethics—our readers will perceive that we are describing no ordinary man. From Clarke County Mr. Hart proceeded to Lexington, which became his second home; and it was from here that his fame gradually spread over all the Union. He was selected by his fellow-countrymen to execute the bust of General Jackson, the most popular man in the Union since Jefferson; and, on Mr. Hart's departure for Italy, Henry Clay sent him a sort of moral passport addressed to all the Americans in Europe, highly eulogistic of his genius and personal character. It may well be believed that the six years spent in Italy were not lost on a man of his genius.

As he advanced in the practice of his art he conceived the idea of overcoming by mechanical means two of the greatest difficulties that beset the sculptor—that of poising from the first every statue in embryo so as confidently to relate all the lines to the centre of gravity; and secondly, even in busts, in which the laws of gravity do not require so much study, to determine the masses in an easy and certain manner, so as to effect a great saving in time. The admirable works that Mr. Hart has produced in half the usual time are a proof that he has succeeded in this object.

In order to make our readers understand the nature of this invention we may state, first of all, that a framework is applied to any part of the body; that for the face, for instance, is in the form of a large mask, through which are perforated blunt pieces of iron like the needles of a compass. These needles, movable at will, are intended to fathom the depth of space from the mask to all the protuberances and sinuosities of the human face, such as the point of the nose, the bridge of the nose, eyebrows, and chin, down to the hollowest parts of the eye. These needles being blunt give no inconvenience to the skin. By a turnscrew each can be fixed in due relation to its neighbour perfectly indicative of the sinuosities of the human face, and, when completed, can be withdrawn as conveniently as a door opened and shut on its hinges.

But, in order to effect this very delicate operation, the sitter must not only be perfectly at his ease and comfortably placed, but the artist must also be secure of his immobility. This is managed in an equally ingenious manner by a mechanical chair, every portion of which can be elevated or depressed, closed or expanded, so as perfectly to fit the sitter, be he Daniel Lambert or the living skeleton. The principle of this machine can be applied to any part of the human body. A strongly-developed shoulder-blade or a genuflexion corded with strong muscle can be taken as easily as a face. Once the figure poised, any number of points may be taken, showing the exact relation of each to every other point of the human form, and the whole in relation to gravity.

Mr. Hart adopts one hundred and eighty points, but, the principle once evident, they may be increased, and, when the sitter is relieved from the perfectly-fitting cuirass of blunt needles, the space down to the surface of the living figure is for a certain distance filled up with clay. Thus, the undulations are obtained with mathematical precision, the basis is certain, and established at once. But great exception has been taken by the Italian sculptors to this invention, on the ground that it attempts to supersede art by mechanical invention. This is, however, not the case; all the most delicate art of the sculptor in seizing the evanescent elixir of expression comes afterwards, and has the fullest scope that the most transcendent idealist can desire. Such an invention, by most materially abridging labour, will enable sculpture to be more generally used, and the sculptor to employ on elevation of expression time which has been hitherto expended in establishing the relation of the masses to each other by the mere guesswork of the eye. Nothing, in our opinion, can be more absurd than this outcry against the marriage of mechanics with art. It is condemned by all that we know of art-history. John Van Eyck, who first made effective the use of drying oils, was at the same time the first Flemish artist of his age; and, if Leonardo was a great hydraulic engineer, he was in expression as an artist surpassed by none of his contemporaries and equalled by only one of his successors.

Nor can we omit in conclusion giving, as nearly as we can express it in our own language, the opinion of a great living artist on this invention, which perfectly agrees with what we have already laid down. "If the Creator, as is admitted, has seen proper to express all the character which the sculptor can give to his works through form alone in the human body, whatever means may be employed more perfectly to render that form is likely to realise the most accurate expression and afford a basis for the highest ideal."

A specimen of Mr. Hart's powers is to be seen at Messrs. Graves'—a female figure of great elegance and refinement; the anatomy of the breast, such as in the first cartilage of the thorax, showing a science in which the antique was not always adept. But we do not think the statue well named. La Penseroso suggests a more unconscious absorption in thought than we find here. To the bust of Dr. Southwood Smith exhibited at Lord Shaftesbury's had been read the tributes of a recognition of great excellence and truth; and our readers will not be displeased at our quoting the lines of Mr. Leigh Hunt which are to be inscribed on this memento of one of the most philanthropic men of his age:—

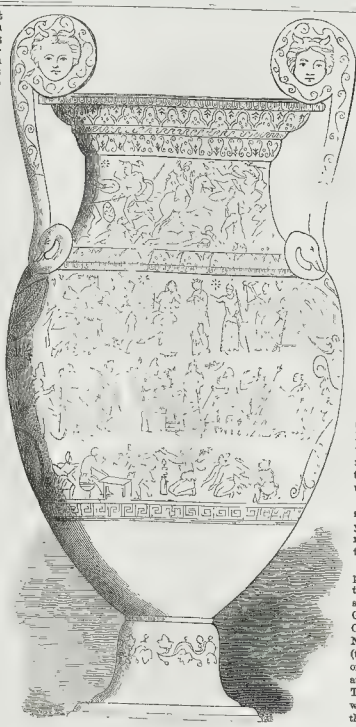
Thee, Southwood Smith, physician of mankind;
Bringer of air, light, health, into the home
Of the sick poor of happier times to come.



THE DARIUS VASE, FOUND AT CANOSA.

But to return to Mr. Hart after this digression, we are happy to learn that his invention is going through the office of patents in this country, and we trust that a man who has spent so much valuable time on a complicated machine will reap the pecuniary reward to which he is entitled. Without knowing the originals of his busts, we can vouch for the extraordinary air of vitality and individuality which they present.

THE PAINTED VASE OF DARIUS FOUND AT CANOSA.

This exquisite work of antique art is of the form of the Apulian Amphora, and is the largest that has ever been discovered. It is made of the finest earth, and for its historical subject, in which we find fifty figures, is perfectly unique. Just under the neck of the vase is described the combat of the Greeks with the Amazons. Then follows a representation of the principal subject of the vase, the war of the East against the West—of civilisation against barbarism. The figures are distributed in three several series. In the first is Asia, under the form of a beautiful woman, who sends against Greece the Genius of War armed with burning torches. Greece takes refuge between Minerva and Jupiter, and the latter presents to her a young winged Victory, who announces to her the happy termination of the war. Then follow Apollo with a swan, and Diana on a stag—both protectors of Greece. Whilst this scene is passing on Olympus, in the second series of figures may be seen Darius, King of Kings, seated on a throne, with his robes and his tiara richly embroidered and jewelled. A guard, who bears a dagger or sword in one hand and a lance in the other, stands behind the throne in the act of guarding the great Monarch of Asia. On his right and left are seated the satraps, who form the grand council, which discusses whether the war is to be carried into Europe or not. One warrior, who is on foot in front of the King seems to counsel and persuade him to undertake such an enterprise. Immediately below, in the third series of figures, there is a satrap, who receives the tributes of the provinces and kingdoms of Asia in money, precious objects—such as pateræ, candelabra, &c.—wherewith to defray the expenses of the war. These provinces are represented under the emblems of young and beautiful women.

In the posterior part of the vase is a figure of Bellerophon, who is seated on Pegasus and fights against the Chimæra. Many Asiatic youths, with slaves in their hands, assist that hero to overcome the monster Pan. Juno and Neptune, protectors of Greece, are painted in the upper part of the scene.

Under the neck of the vase, and still in the posterior and less important part, are represented sacred mysteries. All the figures on this wonderful vase have their names inscribed above them. The design and the composition are of the most beautiful epoch of Magna Græcia. It was found during an excavation made by the Cav. Carlo Bonucci, Inspector-General of the Monuments of the Kingdom of Naples, in the Necropolis of Canosa. The site is close to the Ofanto (the Aufidus of the ancients), about four miles distant from the ruins of Canusa, where Hannibal obtained his great victory over the Romans, and it was within the walls of Canosa that the fugitives took refuge. The Pres. D. Salvadore Fenicia, of Ruvo, in Puglia, merits, together with Bonucci, the praise and the gratitude of the world, for it was at the suggestion of the former that the site was opened where this great archæological discovery was made. In the same tomb where this vase was found, other rarer vases of classical merit were discovered; as also a complete armour of bronze, with which the deceased warrior was still clothed. We have only to add that the "Vase of Darius," the largest and the most remarkable in the world, forms one of the brightest ornaments of the Museo Borbonico, in Naples, and that it has never before been published.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE doors of the grand stand at Lincoln will be once more unlocked on Wednesday and Thursday next, and the racing of the 1857 season inaugurated under Mr. Johnson's auspices. The cross-country work comes off on the first day, a sport to which Tuesday and Wednesday will be duly devoted in Carmarthenshire. So far there has been but little betting on the great spring handicaps. Skirmisher—who is, be it remembered, a savage and unsuitable horse for any lad to ride (a thing many betting wiseacres seldom stop to think about)—has been backed for the Northamptonshire, and mentioned for the Great Northern; Minos is also first favourite among the "jumpers" for the Grand National at Liverpool, where Mr. Topham's handicaps do not range higher than 8 st. 7 lb.; Leamington stands at the head of the Chester Cup odds, for which Mineopie, the miler, is quite out of favour; and Blink Bonny just contrives to keep the lead of the Derby favourites, and finds a stable support at 13 to 1! It will be remembered how we warned every one after Wentworth's Newmarket victory last year that they were to pay no credence to the attempts to "bonnet" that horse for the Derby, as his make and slovenly style of running that race palpably proved he could never get a Derby distance; and we believe that the public are now beginning to coincide with us in the distrust we expressed of Blink Bonny, owing to temper and lack of winter development, some six weeks ago. Weatherbit has gone down to Easly Abbey, where Emilius died, and Birdcatcher first won his stud fame. Hungerford and King of Trumps have retired in the ripeness of their age to the stud, after very long working and chequered careers. A little brother to Schiedam has arrived at the Rawcliffe paddock, where the Dutchman "is full;" and Colonist and Tasmania show much more promise than any three-year-olds at Malton.

The hunting men have been relieved from their frost troubles much earlier than they expected. The Duke of Rutland's hud a very nice gallop on Saturday, and a splendid day on Monday, killing four foxes. Lord Stamford's had also a capital thing on that day, so that Leicestershire, at least, is making up for lost time. Melton was never so full of hunting men, and fifty scarlets left it on Tuesday morning to meet the Cottesmore at Tilton Wood. In fact, the good old times of this "little hunting metropolis" seem quite revived, under the Stamford, Forester, and Trollope dynasties.

Mr. Assheton Smith, who met, we believe, with a slight accident in his house, is better, and will be out shortly again. Hunting literature is very quiet, but we observe that the "Druid" has announced for next Tuesday a "hunting edition" of the "Post and the Paddock," in which the Leicestershire reminiscences of the renowned Dick Christian are a very leading feature. We trust that something will be done by foxhunters, in the shape of an annuity, for this fine old emperor of roughriders, who is in his seventy-eighth year. Now that his remarkable history is coming before the world, the subject has a good chance of being renewed in earnest. Dick is a hardy old fossil, knows not fear, and still trains hunters wonderfully well. In fact, he was to have gone down this October for seven months for that purpose (an engagement which he had regularly fulfilled there during 1841-56) if Lord Scarborough had not died. Hence he is at present living in Chapel-street, Melton, and occasionally getting a horse to tutor. Rather hard lines for an old man, who had had such a good home at Rufford so long.
